Section 506: This section amends section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act to authorize the Board, upon joint petitions by an employer engaged in the construction industry and a labor organization acting in behalf of employees engaged in that industry asserting that the employer recognizes the union as a representative of his employees and has entered into a collective bargaining agreement with the union covering such employees, to certify such union as bargaining representative without an employee election if a collective bargaining relationship has existed between the employer and the union prior to the current agreement and if the Board finds no substantial challenge by the employees of the representative status of the union.

Section 507: This section removes the provision in section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act barring strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement from voting in representation elections.

Section 508: This section amends section 9(c)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act to permit the Board to conduct representation elections prior to hearings, where no substantial objection is made to such a proceeding.

Section 509: This section amends section 9(h) of the National Labor Relations Act to extend the non-Communist affidavit provisions to employers as well as unions, to require that affidavits relate to activities during the preceding 12-month period, rather than at time of execution of affidavit, and to require that they not have been found false by any court.

Section 510: This section saves acts performed prior to the effective date of this title against being treated as unfair labor practices under amendments to the National Labor Relations Act made by the title.

Section 511: This section provides that the effective date for amendments of existing law provided by this title shall be 60 days after date of enactment of the act.

Comparison of Proposed Labor Reform Bills, 1959

Administration bill

Labor organizations covered

Every labor organization (including those representing public employees and employees of nonprofit organizations, and bodies composed of labor organization delegates such as local and regional conferences, councils, etc.) engaged in activities affecting commerce as broadly defined in the bill.

Reporting and disclosure

A. Who Must Report

1. All covered labor organizations, including regional and local conferences and councils and unions representing public employees. No exemption provisions. Every covered labor organization having a subordinate body under supervisory control must file special reports.

2. Every officer, agent, or other representative (defined to include all elected and appointed officers, agents, and key administrative personnel) of a covered labor organization who, or whose spouse or minor child, engaged directly or indirectly in any transaction described in C below (which may involve conflict of interests) with an employer or employer representative.

3. Every employer who engages directly or indirectly in any transaction with a labor organization or with any of its officers, agents, or representatives which they are required to report (involving possible conflicts of interest) and every employer engaging in a transaction described in D below (which may involve interference with statutory rights of individual union members and employees). Under the definition of "employer," Federal, State, and local governmental agencies and employers not engaged in activities affecting commerce are excluded from reporting and other requirements.

4. Under 3 above, employers would have to report financial dealings with unions and their representatives through intermediaries (including labor relations consultants) as well as direct dealings.

B. What Must Be Reported by Unions

1. Organizational structure and procedures

Copies of constitutions, bylaws, and other basic documents having similar effect must be filed and information on organization and procedures brought up to date annually.

Report, signed by president (or other chief executive officer), and secretary (or other chief records officer), must show name and address of union; names and titles of all officers; how these officers (including stewards and delegates) were selected; meeting and election procedures; qualifications or restrictions for membership, initiation fees, dues, assessment procedures; procedures for removal or discipline of officers or agents for breach of trust and for fines, suspensions, or expulsions of members and grounds for such action; any provision made for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence and appeal procedure in connection with disciplinary action against members; procedures for authorizing disbursement of union funds and audit of union financial transactions; and, by reference to documents filed, the procedures for authorizing bargaining demands, ratifying contract terms, and authorizing strikes.

Certification, signed by president and secretary, that constitution and bylaws contain the provisions with respect to election and removal of officers which are specified elsewhere in the bill (title III) and that the union is complying with these procedures (a period is provided for coming into compliance where changes must be made by constitutional convention). The mandatory election and removal provisions are described in a subsequent portion of this chart.

Where union has assumed supervisory control or trusteeship over a subordinate body, a special report must be made semiannually showing name and address of subordinate body; date of assumption and expected length of period of control; reasons for assumption and continuance of control; present status concerning restoration of autonomy; participation of members in selection of delegates to convention or elections; any funds transferred from subordinate body; and normal per capita tax and assessments payable by it.

Expressly provides that individuals required to sign above reports are personally responsible for them.

2. Financial affairs

Annual report, signed by president (or other chief executive officer), secretary (or other chief records officer) and treasurer (or other chief financial officer), must show method by which copies have been made available, as required, to members, and must contain, in such reasonable detail as required by the Secretary, information on assets and liabilities, financial activities during the year, amounts and sources of receipts and amounts and purposes of disbursements, including

S. 505 (Kennedy-Ervin)

Labor organizations covered

Every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce (somewhat more narrowly defined than in administration bill), except labor organizations having fewer than 200 members and less than $20,000 in annual receipts may be exempted from financial reporting by the Secretary of Labor, and the definitions of "employer," "labor organization," and "labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce" are so drafted as to raise a question of inclusion of labor organizations representing public employees and of regional and local conference and councils which do not bargain with employers.

Reporting and disclosure

A. Who Must Report

1. Every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce. As noted above, definitions are so drafted as to raise a question of inclusion of unions representing public employees and of regional and local conferences and councils which do not bargain with employers. Exemption of many unions from financial reporting is made possible. Nationals or internationals having subordinate bodies in trusteeships must file special reports.

2. Every officer and employee (other than a clerical employee) receiving in excess of $5,000 during year in wages, salary, expenses, or other allowances from labor organizations, who engages (either directly or through his spouse or minor child) in any transaction described in C below (which may involve a conflict of interest with employers the union represents or seeks to represent).

3. Employers (including any employer which, with respect to any public employer of employees, may deal with labor organizations regarding wages, etc., but excluding Federal, State, and local governments) engaged in an industry affecting commerce making payments described in D below.

S. 505 (KENNEDY-ERVIN)

4. Any person engaged in providing labor relations consultant services to an employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce and who undertakes, pursuant to agreement or arrangement, activities where an object thereof is directly or indirectly to provide the services described in D below (exempts consultants giving or agreeing to give advice to an employer or representing or agreeing to represent an employer in collective bargaining or before any court, administrative agency, or arbitration tribunal).

B. What Must Be Reported by Unions

1. Organizational structure and procedures

Copies of constitutions and bylaws must be filed, but although the unions may meet the reporting requirements by reference to other governing documents, they are not required to file such other governing documents. Information on organization and procedures must be brought up to date within 30 days from the occurrence of any change.

Report, signed by president and secretary or corresponding principal officers must show the same information as required under the administration bill, with the following exceptions: (a) only names and titles of "constitutional officers (including its principal financial officer)" must be shown; (b) there is no requirement for information on how officers listed were selected; (c) there is no requirement for information on procedures for removal of officers and agents for breaches of trust; (d) information on suspensions of members and grounds therefor is not required; (e) there is no requirement for reporting any provision made, in disciplinary proceedings, for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence and appeal procedure.

No certification of compliance with election requirements of the bill is required.

National or international labor organizations which have or assume trusteeship over any subordinate organization shall file a semiannual report showing the name and address of the subordinate organization; date of establishment of trusteeship; reasons for establishing or continuing trusteeship; participation by members of subordinate body in selection of delegates to policy-making bodies and of officers of national or international union.

Expressly provides that individuals required to sign above reports are personally responsible for them.

2. Financial affairs

Annual report, signed by chief financial officer and two other principal officers, must contain (in such detail as may be necessary accurately to disclose union's financial condition and operations for the year) the following information: assets, liabilities, amounts and sources of receipts and amounts and purposes of disbursements, including specifically salaries, allowances, and other disbursements "to each officer and each employee who received more than $7,000 from amounts paid as compensation and by way of expense or other allowances for each officer, agent, or employee whose aggregate compensation and allowances for the year exceeded $10,000.

The report must explain in detail or by reference to reports required of officers, etc., the full circumstances of the receipt of anything of value from any employer having employees who are or might be organized or represented by the union or from any person representing such an employer (except payments allowable under section 302(c) of the Taft-Hartley Act).

3. Information required in union reports must be made available to each member in such form and manner as Secretary of Labor may prescribe.

C. What Must Be Reported by Union Officers, Agents, Etc.

1. All direct and indirect payments to or from employers having employees who are or might be organized or represented by the union or to or from persons representing any such employers (including transactions engaged in by a spouse or minor child). Also requires information on investments and business transactions so related to such an employer as to possibly involve conflicts of interest. If the officer, agent, or representative of the union derives direct or indirect benefit from any such transaction it must be reported even if the direct participant was some relative or other third person rather than the union officer himself. Payments allowable under section 302(c) of the LMRA, regular remuneration for service as an employee, purchases and sales in regular course of business at regular prices, and bona fide investments in traded securities not involving substantial interest need not be reported.

D. What Must Be Reported by Employers and Employer Representatives

1. Employer must report full information on any transaction directly or indirectly engaged in with the union or its officers, agents, or representatives which the latter are required to report.

2. If the employer directly or indirectly makes specified payments which may involve interference with rights of individual union members and employees under Federal labor-management relations laws, a full report must be made.

labor organizations," loans in excess of $500 to officers, employees, or members, and loans to any business enterprise, with a statement of the security, if any, and arrangements for repayment.

Does not provide for union reports on financial dealings with employers other than loans to a business enterprise.

3. Information required in union reports must be made available to all members in such form and manner as Secretary of Labor may prescribe. Labor organizations required to file reports under trusteeship provisions must also make available information contained in reports to each member or organization under trusteeship.

C. What Must Be Reported by Union Officers, Agents, Etc.

Annual reports by such union officers and bona fide employees as are described above in A–2, describing specified financial transactions with employers, and investments which may possibly involve conflicts of interest, including items such as stock and bond transfers and loans. Also must report if received payments from employers and labor relations consultants pursuant to agreement to influence or affect employees in exercise of rights under section 7 of NLRA or Railway Labor Act. This latter requirement applies to payments from any employer or consultant. The specified transactions do not appear to include all which are reportable under the administration bill, and the exceptions from reporting requirements differ from those in the latter bill.

D. What Must Be Reported by Employers and Employer Representatives

Employer must report any direct or indirect payment or loan or any promise therefor to any labor union or officer or employee thereof, except (1) payments pursuant to a bargaining agreement; (2) compensation paid for services as an employee of such employer; and (3) payments or loans made by a national bank or other credit institution.

Employer must report any expenditures in connection with an agreement or arrangement with a labor relations consultant by which the consultant (a) undertakes activities where an object thereof is to persuade employees in the exercise of their rights to organize and bargain collectively, or (b) undertakes to supply such employer with information concerning the activities of employees or unions; and any expenditure in excess of $2,500 where the object is to persuade employees in the exercise of the above rights. (Exempts adjustments in wages or other employee benefits; and expenditures to obtain information for use solely in conjunction with judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceedings; or for representation in such proceedings.)

Any labor relations consultant who has entered into an agreement described in A–4 above where the object is, directly or indirectly to (a) persuade employees in the exercise of their rights to organize and bargain collectively; (b) supply an employer with information concerning the activities of employees or unions in connection with a labor dispute must file an annual report showing:

(1) The name under which the consultant is doing business and his address.

(2) Receipts from employers for consultant services and sources thereof.

Investigate when from complaint or otherwise he finds reason to believe there may be violations.	Make (and shall make) investigations (only) when he has probable cause to believe that violations have occurred and when any person fails to file a report required (in which event he must report to union members concerning fact required to be in report and reasons why it was not filed).	No provision for amendment of section 302(b) concerning unloading fees.
Subpena witnesses and documents, examine records, and hold hearings in connection with his investigations of violations.	Subpena witnesses and documents in investigations (differs from administration provisions).
Bring court actions in Federal courts for injunctions to compel compliance.	(No provision for any suit to compel compliance.)
Impose sanctions, after administrative hearings, for willful failure to file a true and proper report, which may result in withdrawal from union or employer of privileges conferred by Federal labor-management relations laws and in withdrawal from union of tax exemptions for appropriate period or periods.	(No provision for administrative remedies or sanctions such as withdrawal of tax or other statutory privileges.)	The amendment excepts from improper payments those payments which are made to apprenticeship and training trust funds, in addition to those now excepted under section 302(c).
Issue orders, after administrative proceedings, requiring compliance with reporting provisions, which are subject to enforcement or review in Federal appellate courts.	(No provision for enforceable orders of compliance.)
Publish information concerning violations (except confidential complaints) and investigate facts and practices necessary or proper for enforcement or drafting rules and regulations.	Publish information concerning violations and make studies and reports necessary to aid enforcement.
2. The National Labor Relations Board is required to deny the use of its processes to unions and to employers not complying with the reporting provisions (amends NLRA 9(f) and (g) which now denies such processes to unions failing to comply with reporting provisions of that act).	NLRA 9(f) and (g) are repealed and no comparable requirement of reporting as a condition of using NLRB processes is embodied in the bill. Unions which now have to report organizational and financial data in order to use processes of the Board would be relieved of this obligation and could use such processes even though they refused to file the information required by the bill.

S. 505 (KENNEDY-ERVIN)

Criminal penalties, (fine or imprisonment) are provided for—

Willful failure or refusal to comply with reporting provisions (misdemeanor).

False statements (misdemeanor).

Destruction (not concealment) of books or records required to be kept (misdemeanor).

Conflicts of interests

Reports of possible conflict-of-interest transactions (somewhat different in scope from those covered by administration bill) are required from unions, from union officers and nonclerical employees receiving over $5,000 per annum, from employers, and from labor consultants, as described under Reporting and Disclosure, above.

Criminal penalties (fine or imprisonment) are provided for—

(Bill contains no comparable bribery provision.)

Improper payments by employers or employer representatives (includes some which are made a felony under the bribery provision of the administration bill), as follows:

Would amend section 302(a) to make unlawful employer payments to representatives of his employees, so as:

(1) To include payments by "any person who acts as a labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant to an employer;"

(2) To include payments made to labor organizations, or any officer or employee thereof "which represents, seeks to represent, or would admit to membership" employees of the employer; and

(3) To include payments made to employees of the employer for the purpose of influencing any of the employees in their exercise of the right to organize and bargain collectively.

(4) To include payments made to officers or employees of labor organizations with intent to influence them in their representative actions, decisions, or duties.

Would amend section 302(b) to make it unlawful for any labor organization or any officer, agent, representative, or employee thereof to demand or accept from the operator of any motor vehicle or his employer anything of value as a charge for, or in connection with, the unloading of cargo of vehicle. This section will not make unlawful payment of charge pursuant to collective-bargaining agreement between labor organization and employer of operator made in good faith.

The amendment excepts from improper payments those payments which are made to apprenticeship and training trust funds and pooled vacation funds in the building and construction industry; payment of checked-off periodic payments to, as well as membership dues in, a labor organization; and payments to employees openly engaged in acting for the employer in personnel or labor relations matters.

Union funds and property

A. Financial Reports

Annual financial reports required from all covered unions (except unions having fewer than 200 members and less than $20,000 in annual receipts may be exempted by Secretary, and definitions are so drafted as to raise a question of inclusion of unions representing public employees and of regional and local conferences and councils which do not bargain with employers) (see Reporting and Disclosure).

Reports on financial dealings with employers and labor consultants required from officers and nonclerical employees receiving over $5,000 per annum (see Reporting and Disclosure).

ADMINISTRATION BILL

B. Officer Accountability

Would apply to officers, agents, and other representatives of a labor organization, as defined in the act.

Provides that such officers, agents, and other representatives shall have a duty to the members of the union requiring them to hold money or other property in their custody or possession by virtue of their position for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes for which the union exists. In handling such money or property these officers, etc., would be required to invest, apply, disburse, or otherwise dispose of it in accordance with such obligation and for such purposes and manner as authorized by the constitution, bylaws, and other governing rules of the union.

Provides for actions in any court of competent jurisdiction by one or more of the principal officers of the union in behalf of the members, or by any one or more of the members for and in behalf of himself or themselves, or by an agent or representative designated by such member or members. Specifically preserves any rights or remedies under existing Federal or State law.

C. Criminal Penalties

1. Fine or imprisonment (felony) for embezzlement from funds of union or trust in which union is interested.

2. Fine or imprisonment (felony) for false entries in or wilful destruction of books or records of union or trust in which union is interested.

3. Fine or imprisonment for bribery (felony) or improper employer payments (misdemeanor) (see Conflicts of Interests, above). No provision prohibiting loans by union to employees.

Union officers and elections

A. Reporting

1. All unions must report how all incumbent officers were selected and election procedures for selection of officers and stewards (see Reporting Requirements).

2. All unions must certify that prescribed minimum standards for election and removal of officers are provided and are being followed (see Reporting Requirements).

B. Standards for Election of Officers

The following standards are prescribed and are directly enforcible:

Elections not less frequently than every 5 years for officers of national or international union, every 3 years for locals.

Officers (including constitutional officers and elected members of governing or executive bodies) to be elected directly by secret vote or, in national or international union, by delegates elected by secret vote.

All members entitled to nominate or be candidates, and to vote, upon due notice and without restraint or coercion; delay in payment of checked-off dues may not disqualify a member.

Constitutions and bylaws must contain complete election procedures, which must be observed (period for coming into compliance provided where change must be made by constitutional convention).

Use of union or employer moneys to promote candidates prohibited.

S. 505 (KENNEDY-ERVIN)

B. Officer Accountability

No provision declaring responsibilities of union officers, agents, and representatives.

No provision for members' suit to enforce responsibilities of those handling union funds, except that a member may, if union and its officers refuse, sue by leave of court to recover embezzled or misappropriated union funds from person convicted criminally of the misappropriation.

C. Criminal Penalties

Fine or imprisonment (felony) for embezzlement of funds of any organization exempt from taxation under section 501(a) of Internal Revenue Code. (This includes many different kinds of organizations other than labor unions).

Fine or imprisonment (felony) for false entries in or willful destruction of books or records of union or trust in which union is interested.

Fine or imprisonment (misdemeanor) for direct or indirect loans from employers to union officer or employee representing or actively seeking to represent his employees; and for loans in excess of $1,500 from a union to any of its officers or employees.

Fine or imprisonment (misdemeanor) for other improper employer payments (see Conflicts of Interests, above).

Union officers and elections

A. Reporting

Unions must report procedures for election of officers and stewards.

No provision for certifying that election standards are met.

B. Standards for Election of Officers

The following standards are prescribed and are directly enforcible:

Elections not less frequently than every 4 years for officers of national or international union, every 3 years for locals.

Officers (those named in its constitution and the members of executive board or similar governing body) to be elected by secret ballot of members in good standing, for locals, and by secret ballot of members in good standing or at a convention of delegates chosen by secret ballot, for nationals and internationals.

Opportunity for nominations, and members in good standing permitted to vote without coercion or restraint; 15 days' notice of elections not held at regular time; delay in payment of authorized checked-off dues may not disqualify member from candidacy or vote.

Elections to be conducted in accordance with constitution and bylaws insofar as not inconsistent with bill's provisions.

Use of union or employer moneys to promote candidates prohibited.

Election records and ballots to be preserved for 1 year.

S. 505 (KENNEDY-ERVIN)

Special reports are required on trusteeships, as described under Reporting and Disclosure, somewhat less comprehensive than required by the administration bill.

It is made unlawful, and criminal penalties are provided, for—

Counting votes of delegates of subordinate body under trusteeship unless chosen by secret ballot.

Transferring moneys other than normal per capita taxes and assessments from subordinate union.

Enforcement of reporting requirements is only by criminal penalties, as is true of other reporting provisions of the bill (see Reporting and Disclosure).

Enforcement of standards and positive requirements for trusteeships is by suit for injunction, which Secretary of Labor shall bring if, after investigating written complaint of a member or the subordinate body, he finds probable cause to believe that a violation has occurred and has not been remedied. In any proceeding an authorized trusteeship is presumed valid for 18 months, invalid thereafter, unless extended for a period up to 1 year by court order.

The Secretary would be required to report on the operation of the trusteeship provisions to Congress at the end of three years.

Administration of labor reform provisions

Authority placed in Secretary of Labor. Functions could be delegated to a Commissioner of Labor Reports to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. No provision made for delegation of any function under other laws.

No provision for cooperation with other Federal and State agencies in administration of the Act.

The bill would create (in title IV, Codes of Ethical Practices) a 15-member Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices, "to advise the Secretary in the administration of this Act." The Secretary would appoint five members from panels nominated by employer associations, five from panels nominated by labor organizations, and five to represent the public. In addition to meetings at the call of the Secretary the Committee (which would have to be furnished by the Secretary with staff and other facilities) would be required to meet at least four times a year and whenever at least one-third of the members request a meeting.

Codes of ethical practices

Congress declares policy: National and international labor organizations and nationwide and industrywide associations of employers engaged in industries affecting commerce should adopt codes to eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities in affairs of unions and employers which will:

(1) Safeguard democratic rights and privileges of union members.

(2) Promote harmonious union-employer relations and prevent derogation of employees' rights under section 7, NLRA, by employers.

(3) Provide for publication of codes.

(4) Not sanction any union or employer conduct which violates any law, Federal, State, or local.

ADMINISTRATION BILL

Amendments to NLRA and LMRA

A. Secondary Boycotts

Would extend secondary boycotts provisions of NLRA to cover:

Direct coercion of employers to cease, or agree to cease, doing business with another.

Inducement or encouragement of individual employees.

Concerted activities against, or coercion of, secondary employers who do not come within the act's definition of "employer," such as railroads and municipalities.

Would permit union activity against secondary employers—

Who are performing "farmed-out" struck work.

Who are engaged in work at a common construction site with the primary employer and there is a labor dispute involving wages, hours, and other working conditions of employees employed at that site.

B. Picketing

Would make it an unfair labor practice, subject to mandatory injunction, for a union, by picketing, to coerce an employer to recognize it as the bargaining representative of his employees, or his employees to accept or designate it as their representative, where:

The employer has recognized in accordance with the NLRA, any labor organization and a question concerning representation may not be raised under section 9(a) of the act.

Within the last preceding 12 months a valid election has been conducted.

The union cannot establish the existence of sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having it represent them.

Picketing has been engaged in for a reasonable period of time and an election under 9(c) has not been conducted.

C. Federal-State Jurisdiction

Would authorize the Board to decline, by rule or otherwise, to assert jurisdiction over cases where, in its opinion, the effect on commerce is not sufficiently substantial. State agencies and courts would be permitted to act with respect to such cases.

D. Building and Construction Trade Unions

Would authorize the Board, under appropriate circumstances, and where there is a prior history of collective bargaining, to certify unions acting in behalf of employees primarily engaged in the building and construction industry without a prior election.

E. Voting Rights of Economic Strikers

Would eliminate the statutory prohibition which bars economic strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement from voting in representation elections.

F. Prehearing Representation Elections

Would authorize the Board to conduct representation elections without a prior hearing

S. 505 (KENNEDY-ERVIN)

Adoption of codes not compulsory—only an expression of congressional policy.

Secretary is to report on program to Congress 3 years after enactment.

Establishes an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices to advise the Secretary "in the administration of the act."

Amendments to NLRA and LMRA

A. Secondary Boycotts

No provision.

B. Picketing

Would make it an unfair labor practice, subject to mandatory injunction, for a union to picket the premises of an employer for the purpose of taking or obtaining from the employer "against his will or with his consent" any money or other thing of value "for the personal profit or enrichment of any individual." This language, which appears to be directed at extortion, is so worded as to raise a question of its effect on picketing by economic strikers.

C. Federal-State Jurisdiction

Requires the Board to assert jurisdiction over all labor disputes arising under the NLRA except where a cession agreement may be effected with a State agency under terms similar to present provisions of the act. There may be cession of kinds of cases as well as cases under this amendment.

D. Building and Construction Trade Unions

Would permit union and employers in the construction industry to enter into agreements (1) where the majority status of the union has not been established under the act prior to the agreement, (2) requiring union membership 7 days after employment, (3) requiring the employer to notify the union of jobs and the union to refer applicants, and (4) specifying training or experience qualifications for employment or providing priority in hiring based on length of service with the employer. Such agreements, if not otherwise constituting a bar to an election, would not be a bar solely by reason of these provisions. This section would not authorize union security provisions where prohibited by State law.

E. Voting Rights of Economic Strikers

Same as administration provision (eliminates the prohibition barring economic strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement from voting in representation elections).

F. Prehearing Representation Elections

No provision.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to state that the bill carries the names of 14 cosponsors. I ask and urge other Members of this body to put their names on the bill, which I feel provides many of the answers needed in this field.

AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, RELATING TO RENTAL INCOME FROM FARMING LANDS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the existing social security law to provide that rental income from farming lands shall constitute net earnings from self-employment for purposes of the insurance system established by title II of the Social Security Act.

Starting with 1956, the farm-rental income counts toward social security if, in accordance with the rental arrangement, the landlord materially participates in the production or management of the production of the farm commodities on his land. The rental income received by landlords who do not materially participate continues to be excluded from social security coverage.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that the 1956 amendment has been of great benefit to farmers who can show that they, as landlords, materially participate in the production or management of the production of the farm commodities on their lands. However, I have received many complaints from constituents in my State who thought that they would meet the test of material participation, but after presenting their case to the social security office in North Dakota and on appeal to the regional authority at Kansas City, have learned that they have not materially participated within the provisions of the law and were excluded from social security coverage.

Mr. President, it is my thought that the old pioneers who farmed the land until they became old and then moved to town and leased their land for one-quarter, one-third, or one-half of the crop would be entitled to social security and not have to be concerned with meeting the test of material participation as now provided by law.

I have carefully examined an excellent folder put out by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Social Security Administration, which attempts to set forth the general rules and also gives illustrations of tests as to what constitutes material participation. But in view of all this there is still much confusion in the minds of the farmers. Even if there was not confusion in the minds of the farmers, I still feel my amendment to the Social Security Act will be of great benefit to the farmer who has tilled the soil for many, many years and has reached a point where he cannot work it any longer and he leases it on a share basis. His earnings from that farm should be within the coverage of the social security law.

That is what my amendment will do. I hope every Senator and every Representative will agree with this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 754) to provide that rental income from farming lands shall constitute net earnings from self-employment for purposes of the insurance system established by title II of the Social Security Act, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, on January 21 the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] introduced, for himself and several cosponsors, Senate bill 619, to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to allow a deduction for expenses incurred by certain physically handicapped individuals for transportation to and from work, and to provide an additional exemption for a taxpayer, or his spouse or dependent, who is permanently physically or mentally incapacitated, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor of the bill when it is next printed or when it is reported to the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, on January 9 the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] introduced, for himself, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], and a number of other Members, Senate bill 144, to amend Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953. I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor of the bill when it is next printed or when it is reported to the Senate.

TENSIONS IN COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, for the information of my colleagues, I have asked the Legislative Reference Service and the staff of the Foreign Relations Committee to undertake an examination of tensions in Communist China.

This study will extend to the internal frictions, resistance movements, and forces of opposition within China proper. It will also encompass the extent of divergence and cleavage between China, the Soviet Union, and the European satellites.

During recent years, word which has come out of China indicates that the Mao government still has not succeeded in fastening its control over the long-suffering people of China. The regime itself has given evidence of this resistance. Whereas back in 1949 and 1950 there were indications of some enthusiasm for the redistribution of land, the people soon reacted against the regimentation, intimidation, and mass killings. The later attempt of the regime to take back the land from the people under the collectivization program was resisted. In the Chinese newspapers there are numerous reports of overt resistance, work slowdowns, fake production figures, and other efforts of the people to sabotage the establishment of collectives.

In the latest effort of the regime to establish communes, and in case any of the Members have not been following what has been happening in China since last April, let me say that this communalization is nothing more than abhorrent dictatorship at its worst. It is an extreme and final effort of the Mao government to blot out private ownership. The family is to be a thing of the past. Even the words "mother," "father," "son," and "daughter" are being extinguished. In the future the people of China will be identified as "state worker number so-and-so." With landholdings and homes eliminated, with family ties destroyed, with no private ownership, the state can freely move its forced labor at will to state construction programs. The regime already has mobilized the armies and the militia to enforce communalization. Even the Soviet Union has opposed this extreme action.

There is other evidence of friction between China and the Soviet Union. China has publicized its opposition to the high prices extracted by the U.S.S.R. for so-called industrial aid. China made no secret of its animosity over the low level of Soviet military assistance during the Korean war. There has been open competition between the two Communist powers for control over North Korea and North Vietnam. They are also evidently competing for control over the Communist parties in Indonesia, India, Cambodia, and Burma. China has succeeded in reducing Soviet influence in Manchuria and Sinkiang in the northwest; but there is evidence of a continuing power struggle in these regions. There is also evidence of growing concern on the part of China over the deployment of Soviet military forces in the maritime provinces and within China proper. Since the Geneva Conference in 1954 and the Bandung Conference in 1955, China increasingly has asserted, in its foreign relations, its independence of the Soviet Union. A high point of Sino-Soviet cleavage was reached at the time of the Hungarian crisis. After urging the satellites to assert their independence of an overriding Moscow authority, China then showed its power in the role of bringing the satellites back into the fold. Mao Tse-tung's hundred flower experiment brought to light the extent of animosity between China and Russia.

Mr. President, it is needless to expand upon the relevance of these developments to our foreign policy. In undertaking this study, I hope that we can assemble enough facts to bring some light on the extent and nature of these tensions. My colleagues will recall that several years ago, while I was serving as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, we had a similar series of studies prepared. Those studies on tensions in Soviet captive countries proved to be most useful. I should like to quote from the study on tensions in Hungary. The last paragraph of that study, published in 1953, reads:

> To sum up: The Communist regime in Hungary is confronted with the inexorable alternative of either maintaining its minority dictatorship which is bound to generate an ever-increasing opposition among the people, or of loosening its total grip on the country by making real concessions—a course which would be incompatible with communism's fundamental tenets and purposes. Neither alternative augurs well for the future of communism in Hungary.

Mr. President, certainly events of the last several years have emphasized the accuracy of that conclusion. I believe that a similar examination of tensions in China will also be fruitful. I wanted the Members of the Senate to know that this study is in progress.

THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared in respect to the Small Business Administration. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART ON THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

I would like to take this opportunity to refute before the honorable gentlemen present a charge that the administration is sabotaging the Small Business Investment Act passed last August by the Congress.

Following President Eisenhower's approval of the act last August 21, 1958, and the formation of the Small Business Investment Division under the Small Business Administration that agency undertook to recruit qualified investment banking personnel and loan experts both within and from without the Government to staff this Division.

Immediately upon the signing of the bill into law, the Small Business Administration established a unit of qualified persons from within the agency to begin work on the regulations until a staff could be recruited to administer the Small Business Investment Division.

Aware that translation of the law into a workable set of regulations which would stand the test of time and the manifold ramifications of an entirely new and untried concept of small business financing faced them, the Small Business Administration officials conducted conference after conference, meeting after meeting of investment banking experts, corporate attorneys and commercial banking executives to chart a course of operations and direction on this previously untraveled sea of financing.

Simultaneously, the investment unit, in cooperation with the efforts of the general counsel of the Small Business Administration, continued work on the regulations governing the long term loan and equity financing aspects of the new law and by October 27, only 14 working days later, came up with a preliminary draft of the regulations. This preliminary draft was published in the Federal Register on October 29 to draw additional comments and advice needed by the agency to promulgate in final form a set of guideposts for those who would seek assistance under the act.

During this period, attorneys and personnel of the Investment Division of the Small Business Administration, and frequently those of other interested agencies, spent Saturdays and even Sundays going over the proposed regulations and the comments which were submitted, to insure a minimum of loopholes through which the undeserving and the just plain unscrupulous dollar grabbers might try to gain access to Federal funds intended to help deserving small businessmen of this Nation.

Just a few working days later, in what even the most biased critic would certainly not label an instance of resistance, red tape, and delay, the regulations were published in final form in the Federal Register. Published, I might add, with the full knowledge that changes would ensue; that conditions would arise which could not be foreseen without the help of a soothsayer's wand; that instances of difficulties not within the experience of the most knowledgeable investment banker would occur.

Is this an act of sabotage? Is care and consideration given to the administration of the act to prevent the wholesale misuse of Federal funds by the "quick buck" boys an act of sabotage? I leave the answer to you honorable gentlemen.

A major problem facing the Small Business Administration and its Administrator, Wendell B. Barnes, was the staffing of regional offices with qualified personnel possessing investment banking background. These persons would administer the details of operation, aid interested companies in obtaining licenses under the act, explain the manifold intricacies of the act to them and serve as a liaison between those sincerely interested in forming small business investment companies, and also maintain liaison with the Small Business Investment Division in Washington.

The Small Business Administration hoped for, but was not optimistic about obtaining immediately, competent men for all its field offices throughout the country. It did believe, however, that sufficient numbers of qualified men could be found who would be willing to staff the investment divisions of its regional offices. To date, it has been successful in that quest, and qualified personnel for its investment divisions of regional offices are hard at work explaining the law to interested companies, despite the demands made upon them by persons whose preliminary questions indicate they are merely curiosity seekers or those seeking a Federal handout.

This progress is not, I say again and I am sure you will agree, an example of resistance, red tape, and delay.

Aside from the problem of staffing the new division was a major one of obtaining an administrator whose investment background would be sufficient to understand and cope with the multiplicity of financial problems surrounding the new division and whose executive ability would justify his appointment.

From the nature of the qualifications required and the ability needed to administer an untried project, it was obvious that such a man must come from the field of finance. Would salary be the sole objective? Obviously not. Only a man with a desire to serve his Government, and whose qualifications were unquestionable, would fill the bill.

By combing the field, weeding out the unfit and reluctantly passing over those who, while qualified, could not afford economically to devote their time to such an untried project, Administrator Barnes selected a man whose ability and background qualified him on those counts, and whose desire to serve his Government transcended material gain.

Early in December, Administrator Barnes announced that Duncan H. Read, Middleburg, Va., banker and retired from a partnership in a famous New York investment banking firm, had indicated a willingness to serve. Under his guidance, the Investment Division has been moving fast to get the machinery for providing long-term financing to small businessmen into motion.

I ask again, is this resistance, redtape, and delay?

I think you will agree with me that it indicates progress rather than delay.

Another proposal of the critics would remove the administration of the Small Business Investment Act from under the Small Business Administration and place it in the hands of an "independent, bipartisan commission or board."

This Congress, in its wisdom, rejected that move as too expensive and, in many instances, a duplication of duties. It would not be inconceivable, it was argued then—and it is still applicable—that a small business might need financing simultaneously from both the Small Business Administration and an investment company.

This proposal, I think, was best answered by the Congress at the time of passage of the law.

Another criticism is set forth. The Government, through the Small Business Administration, it is charged, set a prohibitive wholesale rate of 5 percent interest on funds it will lend to small business investment companies for relending to small businesses.

The cost to the Small Business Administration for the money it obtains for the purposes outlined by Congress is approximately 2⅜ percent. Last year it was 3¾ percent. To lend Federal funds to investment companies at a rate lower than 5 percent—which, incidentally, seems to have drawn no complaints other than those of the something-for-nothing group—would force the Small Business Administration to administer the law at a loss to the taxpayers and amount to a subsidy, a circumstance I am sure was not within the intent of the Congress in passing the Investment Act.

On December 4, the day the final regulations governing the licensing of investment companies was published in the Federal Register, the SBA received its first application from a small business investment company.

Hundreds of other companies are studying the law and its regulations before submitting proposals under which they will operate. In addition, more than a hundred letters of intent to submit proposals have been received in Small Business Administration regional offices.

To date, 26 actual proposals for licensing companies have been submitted to the Small Business Administration, most of them submitted in the past 2 weeks. The Small Business Administration will act upon those this month.

The criticism that more than 10,000 companies whose financial responsibility and experience are beyond question are vainly knocking on the door to be licensed can be best answered by the total count of 26 proposals so far submitted. The doors of the offices in the Small Business Administration are open. No knocking is necessary. They need only enter who seek assistance there.

The 26 proposals, it might be added, indicate neither an instantaneous and overwhelming demand to obtain licenses, nor the existence among companies of a license demand of near-crisis proportions.

This should not be taken to mean that there is no demand. Instead, it indicates only that those planning to seek licenses are proceeding slowly in drawing up proposals; that they and their attorneys are studying carefully all the pitfalls inherent in entering a field of financing which has no precedent to guide their actions.

Fully aware of this precautionary attitude, the Small Business Administration has taken steps to provide firsthand information to potential licensees in the Nation.

The Small Business Administration has scheduled for the month of January three areawide clinics across the Nation to spell out for potential licensees the full details of operation of the Investment Act; how the Small Business Administration will license companies; what problems they may face; how they will be regulated, and what assistance they can expect from the Small Business Administration.

At these same clinics will be representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission, invited expressly by the Small Business Administration, to explain the regulations under which the SEC operates, the provisions of both the Securities Act of 1933 and the Investment Act of 1940, and what exemptions may be granted small business investment companies under those laws.

More than 1,000 commercial and investment bankers, accountants, lawyers, and businessmen have indicated they will attend the first of these clinics, to be held in Los Angeles, January 16. Nearly 400 have announced they plan to attend the second meeting, to be held 3 days later in Kansas City. The third seminar, to be held in Philadelphia on January 30, has drawn acceptances from more than 250 potential licensees and answers to invitations are still coming in.

The Small Business Administration succeeded in each case in getting a local organization to sponsor these clinics. In effect, they are being sponsored at no cost to the Federal Government.

At the same time, regional directors and investment division officials will be holding workshop conferences in these cities, included in which will be regional representatives of the Securities and Exchange Commission, to iron out the multiplicity of details connected with expediting the proposals of applicants for licenses under the new act.

These regional and branch office personnel, and the SEC representatives, will be going over every operation, with a view to making simpler the task of submitting and getting approval of the proposals of small business investment companies seeking licenses.

I ask again, is that resistance, redtape, and delay?

I think the honorable gentlemen in this body should know that the officials and the personnel of the Small Business Administration have put their full efforts to speeding the day when the small business investment companies will be operating in substantial numbers.

The new law seems a complicated one to the small businessman, and to those who wish to establish small business investment companies. This is not unexpected. With nothing to guide him from past experience, the small businessman and his counterpart in the investment field want full clarification of the problems ahead of them in this new field. The Small Business Administration has made every effort to provide this information.

The criticism leveled at the Small Business Administration comes from a representative of a political party which has long shouted its devotion to the improvement of the lot of the common man.

Yet, for many years no attention was paid to the lot of the small businessman—apparently he was not quite common enough.

It was not by accident that the Small Business Administration was established upon recommendation of the present administration. The Republican Party, which had for many years tried to assist the small businessman when he was neglected by those who shouted loudest and beat their breasts for improving the lot of the common man, is justly proud of its contribution to the formation of the Small Business Administration.

Few, if any, Members here today have not received glowing tributes of the accomplishments of the Small Business Administration from constituents.

I for one, and there are undoubtedly many of you on both sides of the aisle, feel proud of the record of the Small Business Administration in aiding the Nation's small businessman.

The administration, I feel free to say, takes pride in its record of assistance to the small businessman and is justly proud of the Investment Act, moving rapidly as it is, under the Small Business Administration, to open new avenues of long-term credit for the small businessman so that he may obtain his rightful share of the economic progress with which our Nation is blessed.

RACKETS AND COLLUSION IN LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, one of the outstanding omissions of the last Congress was failure to enact legislation to deal with the problem of rackets in the labor movement and labor-management collusion to the detriment of the public and the individual worker. I urge that this Congress take early action to supply this need by passing adequate legislation to assure that the abuses we are almost weary of reading about in the papers will disappear from our labor movement.

By adequate legislation, I mean legislation that really deters embezzlement, collusion, and bribery with regard to union funds and labor-management relations, not a halfhearted, stopgap gesture in this direction. I mean legislation that would not only require filing of papers with the Federal Government, but would give the Federal Government required authority to see to it that these documents are complete and truthful, and, after due process, realistic sanctions to apply to violations.

In my opinion, the bill introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is the answer to the need for such legislation. It not only recognizes that disclosure is the needed antiseptic for corrupt dealings, but makes sure that this disclosure really takes place.

If, after discussion and debate on the bill, it should appear that there were weaknesses which would prevent forcing such disclosures, I, for one, would vote to support such amendments as would make the disclosures realistic and an actuality.

The bill not only requires that employers, unions, and union officials file information on their transactions with one another; it provides realistic investigatory powers and court process to make sure that they do. It does not leave the burden of law enforcement with the individual union member, which experience tells us demands too much individual sacrifice to be an effective procedure. Not once, not hundreds of times, but thousands of times, it has been demonstrated that the individual union member is not in a position to make the individual sacrifice necessary to enforce effective procedure.

The bill would not take away existing filing protections under the Taft-Hartley Act, but would strengthen them in their application to both employers and unions.

Finally, the bill has one very great merit, in that it places upon those to whom union funds are entrusted the same responsibility which every other citizen in the United States must assume when he handles the funds of other people, namely, a fiduciary responsibility; it places him in a position of trust. This is the principle which the Senate applied last year in dealing with the union welfare and pension fund legislation. The Senate applied it even to situations in which the members contributed none of their own funds. It is only right, just, and equitable that we apply the principle in this instance, in which members are dealing with their own funds.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE THOMAS S. GORDON, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I should like to pay tribute to the late Thomas S. Gordon, who for 16 years, from 1943 to 1959, was a Representative in Congress from the Eighth District of Illinois. Tom Gordon was a singularly good man, honest, modest, and kindly. We first became acquainted when my wife was serving with him in Congress, and when they were both members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

In our 15 years of friendship, neither my wife nor I ever heard Tom Gordon utter a harsh or malicious word. He constantly sought out the good in other people and based his own conduct on the assumption that the finer qualities were the deeper and more abiding qualities in everyone he met.

Tom Gordon was a good Congressman, who worked for the welfare of the people of his district, his State, and our Nation. A leader in the Polish-American community, he was first of all an American with a deep and enlightened patriotism. A faithful and devoted member for many years of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, he became its chairman in 1957, only to be stricken down with a severe heart ailment last year, when he was at the very height of his career. He bore his sufferings with bravery and dignity, but he was compelled by illness to relinquish his position as chairman, and then, on the advice of his doctors, decided not to stand for reelection.

His death is a heavy loss, not merely to his friends, but also to the city of Chicago and to the country. He left the world the better because of his life, and I am sure we all join in expressing our sorrow and extending our condolences to his widow and to the other members of his family.

ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared, on the 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Ukrainian Republic, and the desirability of independence for the various other Slavic peoples outside of Russia, be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DOUGLAS

Last week, several of my colleagues inserted statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD calling attention to the 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Ukrainian Republic and expressing the hope that the Ukraine may be freed from its Communist rulers and oppressors. I join in these hopes.

The free world was electrified and inspired by the bravery of the troops from the Ukraine who, when called in to put down the Hungarian revolt, climbed out of their tanks and gave them over to the freedom fighters in that beleaguered country. While the surrender of these arms to those who were revolting against the Communist domination of Hungary was not crowned with success, the solidarity of Ukrainian troops with the struggle of the Hungarian people for freedom was a dramatic demonstration that the love of liberty has not been crushed.

At the same time other reports came out of the Ukraine of disturbances which were occurring in that country. And in recent months news reports suggest that the Communist leaders are still deeply concerned about the bourgeois nationalism of the Ukraine and are mobilizing authors, academicians and others in Kiev to counteract it. There have been many indications of a consistent pressure among the Ukrainian people for freedom. And the unexpectedly low levels of wheat production there necessitating costly importations of foreign grain into Russia no doubt reveal the opposition of the people to the Communist regime. In the light of the oppression to which these people are subjected and the rigid secrecy imposed by the Iron Curtain, these demonstrations of the spirit of the people of the Ukraine must be of inspiration to free peoples everywhere.

I further hope that the various Slavic peoples outside of Russia such as the Ukrainians, Poles, Lithuanians, Latvians, Estonians, Czechs, Slovaks, Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, and Byelorussians may be able at an opportune time to throw off the yoke of their Communist oppressors and become free, independent, and democratic states. I also hope they may federate together so as to have a common defense, a common foreign policy, internal free trade, etc., while each country would retain its own language, religion, and cultural autonomy. Only in this way, I believe, they can maintain their independence against the pressures of a powerful Germany to the west and Russia to the east.

The Lithuanians would apparently prefer to join a Nordic or Baltic federation of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, and Finland. But if they would prefer to join the federation of non-Russian Slavs, I am sure they would be welcome.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, January 22 was the 41st anniversary of the date the Ukraine gained its independence.

The Ukrainian people have waged a long and honorable struggle for independence from Russian dominance. Even though independence may seem further away than ever, the history of man's search for freedom shows clearly that the slave way must eventually fail.

The resources of this vast region—long the granary of Europe but now the Soviet Union's breadbasket—have a tremendous potential. But the greatest of all is the resourcefulness and the strength of the Ukrainian people.

By remaining steadfast to our principles, by honoring those who strive for a heritage which is rightfully theirs, we will yet see the day of true independence for Ukrainians.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S RECOMMENDATIONS FOR LABOR REFORM LEGISLATION

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, President Eisenhower's recommendations for labor reform legislation are sound, temperate, balanced, and realistic. I strongly support their enactment.

The President's recommendations are neither pro nor antiunion; nor are they pro or antiemployer. I would never subscribe to any proposal that was.

Recent developments in some areas of labor-management relations have been very disturbing. Some union officials have forgotten that the purpose for their existence is to represent employees in collective bargaining. Some unions and employers have been careless of their obligations not to use the tool of collective bargaining to promote the interests of management and unions, as such. They have disregarded the rights and interests of the individual worker.

Traditionally, when the rights of individuals and of the public have been abused, we have provided legislative safeguards to curb such abuses. This is precisely what the administration's bill would do. Just how would this be done?

It would be done by making needed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, including those provisions of the act relating to secondary boycotts and picketing. It would be done by requiring full reporting and disclosure of union organizational procedures and of employer and union financial transactions. It would be done by requiring that certain procedures must be followed by unions in electing their officers and administering trusteeships.

Mr. President, the Wagner Act in 1935, the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, and the President's recommendations in 1959, are all part of the evolutionary process involved in arriving at a labor policy. This policy must take into consideration the respective rights and responsibilities of labor and management and the public welfare. Each successive step is built upon those which have preceded it. The administration's proposals build upon the experience of the past.

I consider the enactment of the President's recommendations vital and indispensable to a moderate and well-balanced program for providing needed labor reform legislation.

TRIBUTE TO J. SINCLAIR ARMSTRONG

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, one of the finest and most effective and most patriotic and capable public servants who ever came to the U.S. Capital to serve his Government was Hon. J. Sinclair Armstrong, Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I had something to do with his coming to the Capital. I watched him in the exercise of his responsibilities as a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, as Chairman of the Commission, and then his movement to other duties in the Department of the Navy.

I should like, therefore, to insert in the body of the RECORD a reasonably brief statement by way of comment upon his services, because I honestly believe that the comment is merited, and is one Mr. Armstrong deserves so richly for the services he has rendered.

I ask unanimous consent to have the statement I have prepared included in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

Before the 86th Congress gets into high gear, I would like to call the attention of the Senate to the loss which our Government has suffered by the resignation of a distinguished citizen of Illinois, Hon. J. Sinclair Armstrong, Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Sinclair Armstrong has made a very real contribution to our Government during the 5½ years in which he has served in the administration. The President accepted Mr. Armstrong's resignation as of January 2, 1959, with real regret and expressing his "sincere appreciation for this record of distinguished service and for the valuable contribution" Mr. Armstrong made.

I presented his name before the Senate in July 1953, when he had been nominated to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission. I pointed out that Mr. Armstrong was one of the outstanding young lawyers in Chicago, who had made a distinguished record for himself, both in his profession and as a citizen identified with many civic and charitable activities in Chicago.

I recalled that the law firm of which he was a partner, Isham, Lincoln & Beale, has a distinguished history, having been founded by Robert Todd Lincoln, son of Abe Lincoln, of Illinois, in 1872.

I then predicted that Mr. Armstrong would make a fine record in government.

The Senate confirmed him and he served as a Commissioner of the Securities and Exchange Commission until May 1957.

For 2 of these years, beginning in May, 1955, he was Chairman of that independent regulatory agency.

In 1954, Mr. Armstrong, under the leadership of the Commission's then Chairman, Hon. Ralph H. Demmler of Pennsylvania, spearheaded the Commission's work with the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, aiding that committee in formulating much needed amendments of the Federal Securities Laws designed to simplify and make more effective their impact on new issues of corporate securities and to be of assistance to small businesses seeking access to the capital market. This legislation was sponsored in the Senate by the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], who was then chairman of that great committee, and the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], who was chairman of the Subcommittee on Insurance, Securities and Banking.

Mr. Armstrong also worked assiduously in Commission's program of simplifying and streamlining the many complex regulations affecting the securities markets under the statutes which the Commission administers in the public interest for the protection of investors.

In 1955, at about the time he became Chairman of the Commission, the securities markets began to be afflicted with a rash of new schemes to defraud the public in connection with securities distributions. These were conducted on a nationwide scale, often by people of criminal record, from so-called "boiler rooms" doing business over the long distance telephone and mulcting thousands of the American people of hard-earned savings by false and fraudulent means. Mr. Armstrong recognized these not only as a fraud on investors who were caught by such schemes, but as a threat to the confidence of the investing public in the integrity of the capital markets and the hundreds of workers in exchanges, brokers' firms and other institutions conducting their business cleanly and honestly.

Under Mr. Armstrong's leadership, the Commission commenced a vigorous program of law enforcement which, coupled with the notoriety which has been given to these shady practices by the Commissioners, their regional officials, and with the aid of the news and television media, has substantially reduced this abuse of the capital markets. I am happy to say that the Commission is continuing today this program of enforcement started back in 1955.

Also, during his tenure as Chairman of the Commission, the very large burdens of administrative work incident to the heightened economic activity of the past few years were handled in an effective and efficient way by the Commission and its staff.

As I have said on this floor before, I have been familiar with the work of the Securities and Exchange Commission since it was established, because of my membership on the Appropriations Committees of the House of Representatives and later of the Senate, and as a member of that committee of the Senate I was fully informed of, and aided and encouraged by Mr. Armstrong in, the program for better enforcement and administration he so ably led.

Mr. Armstrong left the Commission in May of 1957 to go on to his well-deserved promotion to Assistant Secretary of the Navy with the great admiration of many Senators and Congressmen who had observed the fine work which he had done. Some Senators present will remember the vicious attack made on his record, and the overwhelming vote of confidence he received by this body on May 23, 1957.

As Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the past year and a half, Mr. Armstrong has been in charge of the financial management of the Department of the Navy and has served as Comptroller of the Navy. The Congress is familiar with the fiscal year 1959 Navy budget, which was formulated and presented to the Congress under his technical direction.

The fiscal year 1960 Navy budget which has just been submitted to the Congress, was also prepared under his direct supervision. In addition to budgeting, as Comptroller of the Navy he has also been in charge of all accounting, auditing and statistical and progress reports of the Department of the Navy. This is a tremendous responsibility, as it includes seeing to all the paymaster functions which, under the National Security Act Amendments of 1949, were finally transferred from the old Bureau of Supplies and Accounts to the new Navy Comptroller Organization in the fall of 1958.

I have been well acquainted with Mr. Armstrong's work, particularly from the vantage point of the Senate Committee on Appropriations. He has rendered a particularly noteworthy service in the Department of the Navy because of his intense interest in our naval forces, in which he served during World War II, and the Marines, and his intense desire to see to it that our fighting forces were strengthened with modern weapons, but that economical and efficient management and management techniques make possible the economy which the Government and the taxpayer so badly need. Mr. Armstrong was not the kind of Secretary to sit at his desk in the Pentagon. He personally inspected all the naval shipyards, Navy and marine training bases, scores of industrial and supply establishments, and sailed and flew in all types of naval ships and aircraft. He was a financial manager who knew the Navy because he lived with it. Last summer, at the time of the crisis off China, he made a most important inspection trip of our whole Central and Western Pacific Naval and Marine forces to assure himself, as he expressed it to me, that what the Congress was providing in money was giving the finest sinews of military strength to our men in service out there.

Mr. Armstrong has been extremely outspoken in his interest in the preservation and perpetuation of the free enterprise system as the best economic and political system under which mankind can live. His record in the Securities and Exchange Commission, in which he was constantly vigilant for the protection of the investing public against sharp practices in the securities market, was based upon his profound knowledge of these markets and their importance in the channeling of the savings of the people into productive American industry as a means of creating employment and raising the standard of living of our people.

In the Navy Department he has been constantly outspoken against the menace of international Communism. The distinguished senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] mentioned in the Senate on January 12th the outstanding address which Mr. Armstrong gave on this subject at Baltimore on November 25, 1958. I urge my colleagues to read his address which appears in the January 12 number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

As a lawyer, familiar with problems affecting the securities markets, Mr. Armstrong made another outstanding address during the late fall, this before the District of Columbia Bar Association. This talk points up many problems which the Congress faces in strengthening the hand of the Securities and Exchange Commission in dealing with the abuses which from time to time occur in the securities markets. I believe that Mr. Armstrong's views should be made available to all Members of Congress.

I join with Mr. Armstrong's many friends in congratulating him on the outstanding job he has done in Government and wishing him continued happiness and success.

It was with considerable sadness that Mr. Armstrong's many friends in Illinois learned of his decision to return, after 17 years in Chicago, to his native State of New York, where he has been appointed executive vice president of the United States Trust Co. of New York. However, the distinguished institution with which he has become associated, which has built up over 100 years a large personal trust and investment management business, is exactly the type of business in which, with Mr. Armstrong's great interest in the American investor, he can use his talents to great advantage.

The development and conservation of savings and investment has provided the very basis upon which our free-enterprise system has succeeded in providing the highest employment and the highest standard of living to the American people. It is very fitting that Mr. Armstrong should continue to devote his talents to this field of activity, in which he worked as lawyer in Chicago and as a member and Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the administration has sent to Congress a bill which the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] has introduced. It deals with labor-management relations.

I am grateful that in the bill this year the administration seeks to deal with such subjects as trusteeships, union elections, and conflicts of interest, which were not adequately covered in the administration labor reform bill of last year. I am also happy that the administration bill, the Goldwater bill, and the Kennedy-Ervin bill, as they deal with the subject of labor reform, cover very much the same ground on elections, prohibition against felons holding union office, and the necessity for reporting and disclosing the expenditure of union funds, and penalties for the destruction of union records.

The administration approach is somewhat different in the area of labor reform—for example, the imposition of penalties upon union members, if the union leader fails in his responsibilities—including a denial of tax privileges and a denial of access to the National Labor Relations Board, in addition to the specific criminal penalties imposed upon the guilty party. I think these provisions are far too broad, and penalize the innocent as well as the guilty.

Nevertheless, the two bills do, in the labor-management reform sections, cover the same areas.

I am hopeful that it will be possible for us to reach a consensus of opinion in our approach to these particular problems.

The administration bill, however, goes far beyond that. The Secretary of Labor last year insisted that several reforms of the Taft-Hartley Act be included in the labor reform bill. Now they have compounded that matter by making extensive changes in the Taft-Hartley bill.

My own hope has been that we could deal with the labor reform and those sections of the Taft-Hartley bill upon which there is general agreement and which were covered in last year's bill; and that when the McClellan committee makes its report in March, and when the advisory panel on labor law revision, which was set up by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare today, completes its studies, we can then consider a second bill, which will include the whole range of possible amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act.

The Goldwater bill not only seeks to tighten up the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, but also expands them drastically. It also seeks to deny employees the right to communicate through picketing, while at the same time it makes no exemption of the right of the employer to communicate with the workers. This, I think, must be a part of any analysis of the question of picketing. For example—and there are a good many other examples which could be given—it seeks to force every employer in the country to file with the National Labor Relations Board an affidavit that he is not a member of the Communist Party. This would be at an estimated cost of $300,000. It would slow up the procedure of the Board, which is already overburdened. One of the complaints we have found in studying the actions of the Board in regard to racketeering has been the slowness of the Board in acting on cases involving improper activities. Yet the Board is going to be burdened down with examining the accuracy of the reports of every employer in the country, to determine whether he is a member of the Communist Party.

A broad revision of Taft-Hartley should be the subject of a separate bill. I am hopeful that the subject of labor reform, on which there is general agreement on both sides of the aisle, will not be endangered by including so wide and far-reaching changes in the Taft-Hartley Act. The subject is difficult enough without involving it in the serious disputes which have prevented the passage of any labor legislation during the past 11 years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should merely like to say that the administration proposal is a proposal designed to meet the problem confronting us in labor-management relations, and moves in the direction of safeguarding certain rights, and we believe that cannot be done unless the proposals are amendatory. We believe that is necessary.

Mr. KENNEDY. There are many perils which surround this subject, and all of us recognize the many difficulties involved. The fact that there have been no changes made in the Taft-Hartley Act of any kind in the 11 years since it has been enacted—and the fact that the bill which was offered in 1954 had to be recommitted because of difficulties encountered during the debate on the floor of the Senate—indicates the difficulties confronting us on the question of changing the Taft-Hartley Act.

Furthermore, some people, for example, would like to repeal section 14(b), involving right-to-work laws. I would be opposed to such action, and I would be opposed to an amendment offered on the floor dealing with this matter in connection with the labor reform bill.

For the same reason, I am also opposed to other changes in the Taft-Hartley Act at this time, although they might be changes which I would favor later. The essence of the dispute is whether we should attempt to make the changes in two stages, with adequate safeguards and assurances to the Senate that the Senate will have a second opportunity; or to act in one stage and perhaps place the labor reform bill in peril by introducing matters about which there may not be general agreement. There are a good many matters in the administration bill with which I am in agreement, such as prehearing elections. But whether we should introduce those subjects and thus endanger labor reform is something about which I am apprehensive.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think our experience as a legislative body indicates that when we address ourselves to labor legislation, we will always have a certain degree of emotionalism. In proportion as it takes on considerable dimensions, that will be true. Perhaps we can better describe it as an expression of durable interest on the part of all groups and shades of opinion in the country.

When we separate, of course, and develop the whole picture, we can take two bites at the cherry. But I am simply afraid that we will finally get lost, after our first experience with a portion of legislation in that field. If we do not take it all at once, and include those things amendatory of the Taft-Hartley Act, they will be likely to come at the tail end of the party, and we may have something of the same experience we had last year. That is one reason why I believe we should devote ourselves to the whole package at once, if we expect to get the job done.

I am not insensible of the fact that the Taft-Hartley Act has continued on and on without amendment for a good many years. That may be a testimony to the complicated job which its consideration involves; and, second, to the fact that perhaps some amendment is long overdue. So this might well be the time to consider that question. If we are to adopt a total approach and do a craftsmanlike job, I think we ought to take it as a whole package.

Mr. KENNEDY. Last year we had the experience of having the Senate pass a bill by a vote of 88 to 1. When the bill reached the House, one reason why it was defeated was that there was included in title 6 a provision affecting the construction trade, on which my position, the position of former Senator Ives, and the position of Secretary Mitchell, were almost identical. Nevertheless, it was opposed by the construction industry. That matter had nothing to do with labor reform. Yet the Secretary presented it. Former Senator Smith, of New Jersey, in the discussions in the committee last year, insisted that that provision be included as one of the matters we would consider in our labor reform measure. So it was included.

I indicate this to show that every time we add a Taft-Hartley amendment, we run athwart of the economic interests of one group or another. The more we pile onto a bill, the more difficult it becomes to get a labor reform bill passed.

I am simply afraid there is a chance that we may add an amendment of one kind or another, which, while it may not appear to be a major amendment, may be an amendment dealing with, perhaps, picketing, the construction industry, or some other factor, which will be opposed by substantial groups in the country, whether labor, management, or the Republican Party, and the entire bill will then be opposed. Then the President may feel that he cannot sign it, and we will not have any labor reform, as to the need for which there is general agreement between both parties.

That is why I say, as a member of the McClellan committee, that labor reform is the primary problem before us. The second problem—and I state it in point of order—is the making of changes in the Taft-Hartley Act. That is why I do not want to risk any danger to the passage of a labor reform bill. I think this is really in the nature of a watermelon and ought to be handled in two stages.

I hope, as a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which the Senator from Illinois also is a member, that we may look at this matter carefully so that we may move along toward the passage of needed legislation in the field of labor reform.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should never want to admit that because there may be a conflict we would run away from it. I think the question is one of need and whether this is the time to act. If we feel that it is time, then, no matter how difficult the job may be, we must summon up all the necessary forbearance and patience which we possess to get the job done. That is the broad base from which the matter must be approached.

Mr. KENNEDY. As the Senator from Illinois knows, the Subcommittee on Labor this morning reported a resolution to set up a group of experts to make a study of the Taft-Hartley law. They will make their report, in April or May, on the whole Taft-Hartley area. So I think that constitutes an additional argument for considering labor reform legislation in the way I have suggested.

In any case, I appreciate what the Senator from Illinois has said. We can get a clear idea when our present hearings are over as to what action should be taken. I thank the Senator.

DEATH OF HARVEY E. NEWBRANCH, JOURNALIST

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, today I want to note the death of one of the truly great men of American journalism, Harvey E. Newbranch, who died yesterday in Omaha, Nebr., at 83 years of age. Mr. Newbranch was recognized nationally as a skilled and forceful journalist. He was graduated from the University of Nebraska before the turn of the century, and rose from a cub reporter to the editorship of the Omaha (Nebr.) World Herald, between 1898 and 1949. In 1949 he retired as editor in chief of this paper and served on its board of directors until 1953.

Several years ago it was my privilege to speak to the students of the high School at Wymore, Nebr. I found on the wall of the high school assembly room one picture, that of an illustrious graduate of the school, Harvey E. Newbranch.

Mr. Newbranch earned the Pulitzer Prize by the writing of an editorial, in 1919, entitled "The Law and the Jungle." This editorial became a nationally read masterpiece illustrating the ravages of mob violence.

In 1949, Mr. Newbranch received an award from the Freedom Foundation for his editorial entitled "God Hates a Coward." I commend the reading of this editorial to my colleagues and others holding public office in America today.

Mr. Newbranch demonstrated an early talent for journalistic achievement. At the age of 13 years he broke into print regularly by writing letters to the editor of his hometown paper in Mt. Pleasant, Iowa. His first assignment as a journalist was an editorial position on the weekly paper published at Wymore, Nebr.

It is my earnest hope that American journalism will produce many more writers who can attain the distinction enjoyed by Harvey Newbranch. His great public service as an opinion-maker for things that are good will never be forgotten. His widow and members of his family will be comforted by his wonderful accomplishments.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I should like to join with my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska, in this expression of tribute to the memory of Harvey E. Newbranch. The passing of Mr. Newbranch marks "Finis" to an outstanding, noble career in the world of journalism. It marks also the conclusion of a useful life.

My colleague has outlined well the high water marks of Mr. Newbranch's greater achievements in his chosen profession. Each of those achievements was preceded and followed by almost numberless instances where the same humanitarian, wise, considered judgment and action were exercised by him. His years of service with the Omaha World Herald helped make a great newspaper even greater and better.

He was well informed, fair, and vigorous, yet compassionate. His memory will serve as a delight and guide as well as an inspiration to his fellow journalists and to a host of others who were his friends and admirers.

On behalf of Mrs. Hruska and myself, I join with my colleague in expressing and extending deepest sympathy and condolences to the members of Mr. Newbranch's family who survive this great American.

SECONDARY BOYCOTTS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am pleased to note that the Goldwater bill, of which I am a cosponsor, contains provisions to amend and make more effective the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act indicates that the Congress assumed that its secondary boycott provisions would effectively restrict union action, first, to compel an employer to stop using products made by nonunion employees or members of another union, second, to prevent the use of new labor-saving devices or processes, third, to exclude competing goods from an area, or fourth, to force an employer to assign work to members of one union rather than another. The experience of the last 11 years, however, has shown that certain methods exist whereby unions may still make effective use of the secondary boycott.

The secondary boycott provisions of the act rest upon a combination of two factors: First, an objective of the union must be to compel one person to cease doing business with another; second, the means employed to achieve this objective must be through a strike or inducement of employees to strike. Sophisticated unions avoid the proscriptions of the act by directly threatening or coercing the secondary employer or his supervisory personnel. They also avoid these proscriptions by inducing individual employees, or workers not defined as employees by the act—railroad and agricultural workers—to refuse to handle the products of the primary employer or by preemployment inducement of workers not to handle certain products. None of these activities is prohibited, because the means used are not those prohibited by the act.

These loopholes which permit unions to instigate effective secondary boycotts should be closed, and the effect of the secondary boycott provisions of this bill will be to close them. Some of the most flagrant practices of labor racketeers are made possible by the inadequacy of the existing secondary boycott provisions. I commend the administration for its efforts to make more effective the secondary boycott provisions of the act. No bill which fails to act in this area can claim to be a truly effective antiracketeering bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, supplementary to the observations which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska and other Senators with reference to the requirements of a good labor-relations bill or improvements in the present statutes, I should like to point out that the bill introduced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] not only requires filing and disclosure of union-management dealings, but also insures that such disclosure will uncover wrongdoings in the labor-management field. Experience with the filing requirements of the Taft-Hartley Act has demonstrated that reporting alone will not necessarily bring violations to light. There must be adequate investigatory and enforcement powers.

So, Mr. President, I am pleased to note that the proposal submitted by the Senator from Arizona—and, as I understand, with the approval of the Department of Labor—requires compliance with its reporting provisions before employers and unions can use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board. The administration's bill contains other provisions for insuring compliance with, and enforcement of, its reporting provisions.

The bill represents a coordinated approach to providing needed protections to the public, individual workers, and law-abiding employees and unions against corrupt practices of a very few. I sincerely hope the Congress will show its good faith and intent by enacting this proposed legislation, which is tailored to really strengthen standards and procedures for healthy, sound labor-management relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

PROPOSED LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS LEGISLATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (S. DOC. NO. 10)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In the state of the Union message on January 9, I reported again to the Congress on the need for enactment of effective Federal legislation designed:

To safeguard workers' funds in union treasuries against misuse of any kind whatsoever.

To protect the rights and freedoms of individual union members, including the basic right to free and secret election of officers.

To advance true and responsible collective bargaining.

To protect the public and innocent third parties from unfair and coercive practices such as boycotting and blackmail picketing.

There is submitted herewith for the consideration of the Congress a 20-point program which will eliminate abuses demonstrated by the hearings of the McClellan committee, protect the public interest and insure the rights and economic freedoms of millions of American workers.

Complete and effective labor-management legislation, not a piecemeal program, is essential to assure the American public that true, responsible collective bargaining can be carried on with full protection to the rights and freedoms of workers and with adequate guarantees of the public interest. These recommendations, when adopted, should do much to eliminate those abuses and improper practices which, I am firmly convinced, the American public expects and believes will be corrected through legislative action. Equally important, they will do so without imposing arbitrary restrictions or punitive measures on the legitimate activities of honest labor and management officials.

I recommend legislation—

1. To require all unions to file detailed annual reports with the Department of Labor and furnish information to their members with respect to their financial operations. These reports would be open to the public, including union members.

2. To require all unions to file with the Department of Labor, as public information, copies of their constitutions and bylaws and information as to their organization and procedures, which would be required to include provisions, which are observed, meeting minimum standards for periodic secret ballot elections of officers, for the removal of officers, and for the imposition of supervisory control over the affairs of subordinate bodies.

3. To require all unions to keep proper records on the matters required to be reported, open to examination by Government representatives and to permit union members, subject to reasonable conditions and upon request, to see and examine these records.

4. To require unions, union officers and agents, and employers to report and keep proper records with respect to any payments, transactions, or investments which create conflicts of interests or have as their objective the interference with the statutory rights of individual union members and employees.

5. To require that union officers hold and administer union funds and property solely for the benefit of the union members and for furthering the purpose of the union and to make this duty enforcible in any court in a suit for an accounting by the union or by members.

6. To require that unions observe minimum standards for the conduct of the elections of officers, including, in addition to periodic elections, the right of members to vote in secret without restraint or coercion and, upon due notice, uniform opportunity for all members to be candidates, procedures to insure an accurate tabulation of votes, a ban upon the use of union or employer funds to promote candidacies for union office, and requiring constitutions and bylaws to contain detailed statements of election procedures and compliance with such procedures.

7. To require unions to observe minimum standards and to conform to the appropriate provisions of their constitution and bylaws in exercising supervisory control over the affairs of subordinate bodies; such control should be limited in purpose to correcting corruption, or the disregard of democratic procedures or other practices detrimental to the rights of the members in the subordinate body, and assuring the performance of duties as a bargaining representative.

8. To place the administration of this legislation in the Secretary of Labor and to provide him with appropriate and adequate authority to issue regulations, investigate, subpena witnesses and records, bring court action to compel compliance and to correct violations, and institute administrative procedures leading to decisions and orders, which would be subject to judicial review, necessary to effectuate the purposes of the legislation.

9. To prescribe criminal penalties for willful violations of the act, for concealment or destruction of records required to be kept, for bribery between employers and employee representatives, for improper payments by employers or their representatives to employees or employee representatives, for embezzlement of union funds, and for false entries or destruction of union books and records.

10. To preserve for union members any present remedies under State or Federal laws, in addition to those provided under this legislation.

11. To amend the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act so as to cover the direct coercion of employers to cease or agree to cease doing business with other persons; union pressures directed against secondary employers not otherwise subject to the act; and inducements of individual employees to refuse to perform services with the object of forcing their employers to stop doing business with others; and to make clear that secondary activity is permitted against an employer performing farmed-out struck work and, under certain circumstances, against secondary employers engaged in work at a common construction site with the primary employer.

12. To make it illegal for a union, by picketing, to coerce an employer to recognize it as the bargaining representative of his employees or his employees to accept or designate it as their representative where the employer has recognized in accordance with law another labor organization, or where a representation election has been conducted within the last preceding 12 months, or where it cannot be demonstrated that there is a sufficient showing of interest on the part of the employees in being represented by the picketing union or where the picketing has continued for a reasonable period of time without the desires of the employees being determined by a representation election; and to provide speedy and effective enforcement measures.

13. To authorize the National Labor Relations Board to decline to take cases where the effect on commerce is relatively insubstantial and to permit the State courts and agencies to act with respect to these cases.

14. To eliminate the statutory prohibition which presently bars certain strikers from voting in representation elections, although their replacements are permitted to vote, and instead to leave the voting eligibility of strikers, as well as all others, to the administrative discretion of the National Labor Relations Board.

15. To authorize the Board, under carefully considered specific conditions, to certify building and construction trades unions as bargaining representatives without an election.

16. In order to speed up the orderly processes of election procedures, to permit the Board under proper safeguards to conduct representation elections without holding a prior hearing where no substantial objection to an election is made.

17. To equalize the onus of the non-Communist affidavit by extending it to employers, as well as unions, wishing to use the processes of the act.

18. To make clear that parties to a valid collective-bargaining agreement need not negotiate during the life of the agreement unless they have provided for, or agree to, the reopening of the agreement.

19. To authorize the designation by the President of an acting General Counsel of the Board when vacancies occur in that office.

20. To require that the Board be bipartisan in composition by providing that not more than three members of the Board may be of the same political party.

I urge that Congress give prompt and favorable consideration to this program. Its enactment, in my opinion, would contribute greatly to the protection of the public interest and the basic rights of individual working men and women.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 28, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and printed.

CURRENT STATUS OF SPACE PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY DR. T. KEITH GLENNAN

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, yesterday Dr. T. Keith Glennan, the distinguished Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, spoke to the Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences in New York City.

Dr. Glennan reported on the current status of the space program and outlined plans for the future, including Project Mercury to put man into space.

I am sure, Mr. President, that every member of the Congress will want to read the full text of Dr. Glennan's remarks, and I ask unanimous consent that they be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NATIONAL PROGRAM FOR SPACE RESEARCH

(By T. Keith Glennan, Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, honors night dinner, Institute of the Aeronautical Sciences, New York City, January 27, 1959)

Several times in the last few weeks, I have been quoted as saying that the United States at present has no space program. Any such statement falls far short of revealing the facts, or of reflecting my true opinion of our space activity. On the contrary, the Nation does have a program for space exploration, with well-defined goals, and I believe that we are proceeding toward these goals with great energy and determination.

The misunderstanding as to my evaluation of the state of our program arose, very probably, from a faulty interpretation of some remarks I made in an interview, which was recorded in mid-November of last year. Only a few sentences of this interview were used in a television broadcast early this year.

Asked whether the United States then had a long-range national space program. I said that our task in NASA was to develop such a program, and that in the meantime we were working on a short-range program, aimed at better understanding of the space environment which we are exploring.

Now, I don't want to quibble over words like "long range" and "short range." These are terms that could mean anything from a few months to a few decades, depending on the frame of reference. What I had in mind, and thought I had said, was that we are now at work on the part of our program that falls within the immediate future—that is, the next 2 to 5 years.

As for the long-term future, I said that our planning was a first task. It is a task we have been working at diligently and, I believe, intelligently. Already we have under way our long-range activities in some major areas. We are making plans in others. We know our goals. We think we know what needs to be done. And we know also that our long-range plans, developed for the years ahead, will have to be changed from time to time, as we learn more about space and how to travel in it.

To set the record straight, I want to discuss tonight the nature of the program on which we are embarked. The Space Act of 1958 placed certain responsibilities on the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to develop a national program. It is about this national program that I want to talk.

A practical program for any undertaking consists mainly of three elements. These include a statement of the objectives to be achieved; an estimate of the resources available to us; and an outline of the steps taken, or to be taken, so that the objectives may be accomplished with the means at hand, or to be developed. This is the kind of sensible program that we have tried to formulate for space exploration.

That public law that President Eisenhower signed, on the 29th of last July, stated our goals. That law placed before us eight specific objectives. Paraphrased for brevity, they are:

1. To expand our knowledge of the atmosphere and space;
2. To improve the performance of space vehicles;
3. To develop and operate vehicles of this kind, carrying instruments, equipment, supplies, and living organisms;
4. To make long-range studies of the human benefits in space activities for peaceful purposes;
5. To establish and maintain the leadership of the United States in space;
6. To cooperate with the military services, on programs of mutual interest;
7. To join with other nations, in making the peaceful aspects of our research universally available; and
8. To avoid unnecessary duplication in men or facilities, by using all existing capabilities of this country to the fullest.

You will notice that the statement of our mission, in the act, nowhere mentions putting man in space. But I think this, as one of the ultimate objectives of all our space activity, is quite obvious. Actually, our effort is directed toward two particular objectives. The first is to make it possible for man to achieve the same mastery over space that he has already secured, in every other region he has attempted to make his own, whether on the surface of the earth, under it, or in the air above it. The second is to free men from one additional element of intellectual bondage—that is, to gain for all mankind additional knowledge about the cosmos. In that cosmos, man is an infinitesimally small part—yet, to the best of our knowledge, he is the only part of it possessing the ability to reason, and to make effective use of his environment.

Our aim, then, is the opening of space to mankind. All the other phases of our work, as described in the act, are intended to pave the way for that supreme achievement. Everything that we accomplish in the meantime, with sounding rockets, satellites, and space probes, brings to us information useful in communications, in meteorology, in navigation, and for possible military purposes. But our real progress will be measured, in the eyes of the world, by the degree to which it contributes toward these two basic objectives—greater knowledge of the universe, some portion of which will be obtainable in no other way than by the attainment of the second objective—which is manned flight in space.

Now, as to the resources available for our purpose, we find ourselves richly endowed with almost everything except time. While rocketry is a very old art, the real pioneers of modern rocket flight—men like Tsiolkovsky, a Russian, our own Robert H. Goddard, and Herman Oberth, a German—began their theoretical studies only a little more than half a century ago. Serious experimentation was undertaken during World War II, and the Russians set up a determined program immediately after the war. Our own long-range missile program—as you know only too well—did not receive substantial support until 1954. As a result of efforts since that year, the progress made in our missile development programs, and the achievements of military and civilian groups in the space field during the past 12 months, have been little short of amazing.

In outlining the resources available to us in the national space program, I naturally begin with those within the NASA. The nucleus of our organization came to us from NASA's predecessor, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. To this audience, the NACA laboratories have been a symbol of dedicated, far-seeing scientific and technological competence—a symbol of integrity in concept and in performance. Truly, NACA has been the world's outstanding organization in the field of aeronautical research and development. The men and women of NACA now operate under the banner of NASA. They form the basic structure on which we are erecting our new organization, with its much broader responsibilities.

Then there are the people who came to NASA from other governmental and industrial laboratories. For example, the Vanguard scientists, and others from the Naval Research Laboratory, form a group second to none in their experience with the development of satellite payload packages. The Jet Propulsion Laboratory, operated by Cal Tech under contract to NASA, represents another great strength in our new agency. It is a principal center of competence in this country for the development of rocket propellants, and of guidance, control, and data acquisition systems.

NASA does not, however, intend to perform all of its work in-house. We shall be doing a very large amount of contracting with universities, and other nonprofit organizations having special competence to perform basic research. Bulking even larger, in terms of dollars, will be the space vehicle systems, most of which we shall be calling on industry to develop and build. Already, we have committed more than $200 million in this category.

Similarly, the Department of Defense has a substantial in-house capability in space activities. As examples, I need only cite the Army Ballistic Missile Agency at Huntsville, Ala.; the aeromedical laboratories of the military services; the tracking and communications networks; and the missile test ranges. But the Department of Defense also depends heavily upon industry and the scientific community, to carry out its requirements in space.

This, then, is the team that must do our space job.

Moving on, we should not forget that the hardware developed by the military services and industry, in the missile programs, has provided and will continue to provide, for some time to come, the booster systems we must use to send our payloads aloft. Adaptations of the Thor, the Jupiter and Redstone, the Atlas, and the Titan missiles will bear the brunt of space-exploration launchings in this Nation for the next several years. Both the military and the industrial organizations involved will continue to provide boosters and launch teams, as they have in the past. It is on this base of competence, in achieving the goals set for the IRBM and ICBM programs, that we are building the propulsion systems of the space program.

We have available to us substantial sums of money, which will carry us a long way, if we use them wisely. The President's budget for fiscal 1960—the 12 months beginning on July 1, 1959—includes $830 million for NASA and the space activities of ARPA and the AEC.

Now, what about the program itself? How imaginative and far reaching is it? What are the timetables involved?

Research, as you know, consists largely of a patient search for answers to questions that retard our progress toward our goals. As we answer one question, we uncover another, or a whole series of others. In a sense, research is the fitting together of small pieces in a puzzle of infinite dimensions. As they say about woman's work, it is never done.

Our program can best be discussed in terms of a number of problem areas in space research, where we are active at the present time, and will be active for years to come. These are:

1. The development of more thrust in our booster rockets, so that they will be able to lift bigger loads into space.

2. The development of more reliability in all the components of our space vehicles, particularly in the control systems that guide them, in the tracking systems by which we determine their performance, and in the telemetry systems which return to us the results of the experiments carried as payload.

3. The development of more knowledge about man himself—his reactions in unfamiliar surroundings of physical and mental isolation, and his ability to deal with novel situations.

In the field of booster rockets and vehicular systems, we need to increase the reliability of those which are now available to us. Also, we need to develop new ones, capable of propelling very much larger and heavier payloads into any orbit or space trajectory we may consider necessary. A program to accomplish these objectives has been established, and is being implemented. The Department of Defense is heavily engaged in the engineering and the prototype development of a cluster of eight Rocketdyne engines, each with 150,000 pounds of nominal thrust. Hence, the whole unit will develop 1,200,000 pounds of thrust, as the base or booster stage of a new vehicular system. Using components that now exist and are reasonably well proven, the cluster is expected to be ready some 18 to 24 months earlier than its successor—the 1½ million-pound-thrust, single-chamber engine, now under accelerated development for NASA at the Rocketdyne Division of North American Aviation. And we expect to cluster these giants, too, so that we can produce 6 million pounds of thrust.

Other developments now under way will provide upper stages with higher energy, of a type and thrust rating that will give us—at the end of 5 years—a family of propulsion systems that will take us far along the road toward our space exploration goals. In all of this work there will be continuous integration with the military missile program, so that we may have the benefit of their developments and may, in turn, contribute to the general increase in knowledge and progress, in the rocket propulsion field.

A second problem area, that of guidance and control, requires particularly heavy emphasis both in planning and implementation. The development of midcourse and terminal-guidance systems clearly seems to be necessary. Above all, simplicity and reliability must be built into these systems. Our principal task at the moment is to acquire information about the space environment—and this calls for reliability in getting instruments aloft, whenever and wherever we may want to make our measurements. Once we have this family of boosters and propulsion vehicles, reliably guided and controlled, we will be able to concentrate fully on the principal tasks that face us: The acquisition of new knowledge, and the undertaking of manned flight in space.

Still another problem—to expand our capacity for tracking and data acquisition—is now well on its way to solution. Additional stations will be established in this country and abroad. These stations may be manned, in some instances, by nationals of the countries where they are to be located. Still further expansion of these networks will be required, as time and our program move forward together.

I simply note what is perhaps the most difficult of our problem areas—our understanding of the capabilities of man himself in this new and exciting adventure. Others who are expert in this field have discussed the questions in detail, earlier today. Dr. Randolph Lovelace, Brig. Gen. Don Flickinger, and Dr. Hubertus Strughold, the illustrious "father of space medicine," who has just been signally honored with the John Jeffries award of your Institute, have defined many of the physiological and psychological conditions that will be faced by the early pioneers in space flight. While much progress has been made, intensive effort is required to assure us that the men who volunteer for space flight possess the physical and mental capabilities to withstand the rigors of flight in space.

Whatever the problems we may encounter in this particular area, I find it difficult to believe that we shall fail in our efforts to surmount them.

In such matters, we find ourselves dealing with the whole field of space science—that new, tremendously important science, in which we learn more about the cosmos by sending equipment to gather basic data in space. What, actually, are the conditions to be encountered by man, when he ventures into space? The one that gives us most concern at the moment is the dual band of ionizing radiation, discovered by Dr. James A. Van Allen last year. With space probes and instrumented satellites, we must collect much more data on the phenomenon—its exact limits, its variation with time and latitude, its composition and intensity. Early manned flights will be carried out at altitudes which will avoid the belts of high intensity radiation. But surely we will not be limited forever, in the distance to which man may be propelled into space.

To focus all of these research and development activities, and give them real meaning—to sharpen the determination with which we tackle these problems—we have undertaken Project Mercury, an attempt by this Nation to loft man into space. Earlier this month, NASA announced that the McDonnell Aircraft Corp. of St. Louis has been chosen to design and produce the prototype of a capsule to carry the man in this project. The first of these capsules will be used for a variety of tests, leading to manned flights later on.

In this undertaking, we are proceeding with all of our energies. At the same time, we face the sober realization that there would be no reward for American science, in proclaiming this Nation the first to put a man into space, if any mishap should occur to the man that could have been prevented by more deliberate and thorough planning. Our aim is to give mankind the benefits of space exploration—not to let some venturesome young man become a victim of our longing for national prestige.

As a matter of fact, the process has begun to select the U.S. citizen who will become our 20th century Mercury orbiting the earth in space.

He will be a university graduate, with a degree in the physical sciences or in engineering. In addition, he will have graduated from one of the military test pilot training schools, and will have a minimum of 1,500 hours of flight time in his log book. He will be younger than 40, and not taller than 5 feet 11 inches. In suberb condition, he will possess the physical and psychological attributes suited for space flight, as determined by top aeromedical scientists who are participating in the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Project Mercury.

Selection of the pilot-astronaut has already begun. He will be one of a dozen volunteers chosen with greatest care. The group will be totally involved in a program of rigorous training for the first orbital space flight, the climax of the Project Mercury program.

Although the first orbital flight by our modern Mercury will surely be a pioneering venture, we are determined that the risks to the pilot will be no greater than those experienced during the first flights of a new, high-performance airplane. As in such airplane flights, the astronaut will play a vital role in the Mercury project. Repeated flights of the space capsule, first carrying only instruments, and later animals, will have tested and proven the practicability of the final phase of Project Mercury—manned satellite flight—before it is undertaken.

The first step in the selection process—already completed—was screening of the records of Air Force, Navy, and Marine officers who have been graduated from their service testpilot schools. On the basis of criteria established with assistance of the NASA's Aeromedical Committee, headed by Dr. W. Randolph Lovelace, 110 potential candidates have been chosen.

Beginning early in February, the pilot-astronaut candidates will come to Washington in groups of about 30 to be given a full description of NASA's Project Mercury. NASA, Army, Navy, and Air Force biomedical experts will participate in these meetings.

Only after these briefings will the candidates be asked if they will volunteer. From those who answer affirmatively, 36 will be chosen for the next step in the selection process. This smaller group will be given a series of intensive physical and psychological tests, which include studies of the candidates' ability to cope with the stresses of space flight and with the environmental and other biomedical aspects of flight performed under confined conditions over a long period.

By late March, it is expected selection of 12 volunteers for the Project Mercury team will have been made. This team will then begin the training program that will include both simulated and actual flight conditions that progressively come closer to those of orbital space flight.

The volunteers will be assigned to the NASA space task group, located at Langley Research Center and under the project direction of Robert R. Gilruth. The Mercury astronauts will be given additional training at the Johnsville Naval Air Development Center, Pa.; the Atlantic Missile Range, Fla.; the Air Force Wright Air Development Center, Ohio, and other biomedical centers in the United States.

At Johnsville, the astronauts will undergo training in a centrifuge that very nearly simulates conditions in a capsule during takeoff and reentry. The early testing period will involve balloon flights in Mercury capsules to familiarize the astronauts with some of the environmental conditions with which they will have to cope.

While the volunteer team is undergoing this training, technical teams will be testing Project Mercury capsule mockups in gradually increasing degrees of range and complexity.

Short range, solid fuel boosters will be used initially to launch these mockups in suborbital trajectories, followed by longer range flights, using more powerful boosters. At a later period in the program, animals will be launched in the capsule in order to determine more completely the environment man will experience in space flight.

All 12 volunteers of the Mercury team will be given the same preflight and flight training. Only immediately before the first manned orbital flight will the first Mercury astronaut be selected.

Project Mercury, a program being conducted with the advice and assistance of the Advanced Research Projects Agency of the Department of Defense, is expected to continue for several years.

In broad outline, these are some of our major activities in space research and exploration. Simply stated, we are working toward the moment when man can travel in space at times, and to places, of his own choosing. In the prosecution of this broad program, I have outlined certain problem areas. From our work in these areas, from the solutions we are able to find, will come many useful devices and systems. They will bring better communications, better weather forecasting, and all of those other activities that seem to be a part of any paper dealing with the benefits to be had from the Nation's space program. Above all, we will have added to the store of knowledge that we may use, hopefully for the benefit of all mankind.

If I may be permitted a personal observation, it seems to me that people who complain because we do not seem to them to have any program at all, are probably thinking not of the program itself, but of a schedule of events and dates, on which fulfillment of the individual tasks may be expected. Timetables can be very useful. They may quicken our efforts to accomplish specific tasks. But as we probe into the unknowns of space, I am reminded of the words of my good friend, Rear Adm. Chick Hayward: "You don't invent on schedule." The so-called breakthrough, leading to the successful outcome of a long period of intensive and concerted effort, has a way of occurring unexpectedly, at the moment when the issue appears to be most in doubt. We expect some of these. But in the meantime, we will press forward to the limit of our capability, as measured in ideas, manpower, and money.

I would be uttering empty prophecies, with little prospect of fulfillment, if I were to assure you that we expect to land a party on the moon for exploration on such-and-such date; build spaceports there; and assemble an expedition to arrive on Mars and investigate its blue-green areas, on such-and-such another date; and so on, until we reach the next galaxy, up the road a piece.

The kind of schedule that we do have is a step-by-step progression toward the ultimate expansion of our present narrow limits in the universe. Taking into account the fact that sometimes an important advance may be achieved unexpectedly, before its turn comes in the natural order of events, our plan calls for the building of one achievement on the data secured by the one before it, in an orderly sequence.

The simplest way to picture this progression, in its broad outlines, is the method used last year in the "Introduction to Outer Space," prepared by the President's Science Advisory Committee. There the steps were divided into phases, under the headings, "Early," "Later," "Still Later," and "Much Later."

The early phase includes the work that we are doing now, in physics, meteorology, space medicine, and so on, with our space probes and unmanned satellites. At the same time, with the X–15, man soon will be exploring the borders of space, in and just beyond the upper atmosphere of the earth.

The next step—which we are now preparing to take, with Project Mercury—calls for the dispatch of man on a succession of brief, experimental, ballistic flights in space. The purpose will be to test our provisions for survival, and for a successful return to the earth.

After that will come the placing of man in a satellite orbit. His function will be to acquire experience, learning how to travel in space. In this phase, we will be testing our techniques of navigation, communication, rendezvous, and survival in case of accident.

And finally, after all these methodical preparations, we will take the big steps—departure of expeditions to the moon, to blaze the trail that may lead eventually to other planets.

That is our program. I think you will all agree with me, that it is as definite and practical as any plan we might formulate, at this early stage in our exploration of the cosmos. Even within the limits that we have defined, it is a project beyond the magnitude of any undertaking ever attempted by mankind.

EFFORTS OF RELIGIOUS LEADERS TO DEAL WITH RACIAL SEGREGATION

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, religious leaders in both the North and South are quietly and courageously working to strengthen the forces of reason and decency in dealing with racial discrimination in America.

The significance of their efforts is difficult to exaggerate, for law and government policy, however right and necessary—and they are both right and necessary—cannot, alone, insure full progress in the field of human rights. Respect for human dignity, for the rights of each individual, must, if they are to endure, spring from the hearts and consciences of all Americans.

It is, therefore, heartening to note the stream of proclamations against racial discrimination that has issued from national gatherings of all the major religious groups in America. Of even greater significance, however, is the growing evidence that individual ministers, priests, and rabbis are coming more and more to the forefront of the forces of moderation and good will in the South itself.

The "Second Atlanta Manifesto," signed by 312 ministers and rabbis in Atlanta, Ga.; the similar manifesto signed by 33 Columbus, Ga., ministers; the actions by the Virginia Baptist General Association, and of a great many individual ministers throughout the States in opposing the use of churches for private school purposes in the face of public school closings; the efforts by ministers and lay leaders of Arkansas' Washburn Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church in the United States to persuade Governor Faubus to reopen the Little Rock schools—all of these are inspiring signs of the increasing part played by the clergy in helping to meet and resolve this great moral issue.

The difficulties that confront the clergy in this effort must not be minimized. Many southern clergymen who have had the courage to take a public stand on segregation have been rewarded with general charges of pastoral incompetence and discharge notices from their local congregations. The gap between pew and pulpit on this issue remains, therefore, very great.

At the same time, a number of observers have noted the constructive role played by lay women and by church youth groups in advancing racial understanding. Surely, these will be—they must be—the leading groups of the future. For, if our churches do not take the lead, the moral fiber of America will be severely weakened.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several matters on the subject.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"OUT OF CONVICTION"—A SECOND STATEMENT ON THE SOUTH'S RACIAL CRISIS SIGNED BY 312 MINISTERS OF GREATER ATLANTA

(Three hundred and twelve ministers and rabbis of the Greater Atlanta area, acting as individual citizens issued a statement on November 22, 1958, calling for the preservation of the public school system. Sixteen different denominations are represented among the signers.)

On November 3, 1957, a statement dealing with the racial crisis in the South, and signed by 80 Atlanta ministers, was released for publication. The fact that this statement, often referred to as "The Atlanta Manifesto," received widespread publicity through the secular and religious press, radio, and television, not only in the South but across the Nation and abroad, was an eloquent commentary upon the nature of the crisis in which we are involved and upon the failure of many of our leaders to confront the problems of our day in a spirit of realism.

Six principles set forth in this statement as essential to the solution of our problem may be summarized as follows:

1. Freedom of speech must at all costs be preserved.

2. As Americans and as religious leaders, we have an obligation to obey the law.

3. The public school system must not be destroyed.

4. Hatred and scorn for those of another race, or for those who hold a position different from our own can never be justified.

5. Communication between responsible leaders of the races must be maintained.

6. Our difficulties cannot be solved in our own strength or in human wisdom but only through prayer and in obedience to the will of God.

The months which have elapsed since the signing of that statement have been a period of deepening danger. The events of the recent past have been such as to call for growing concern on the part of all responsible citizens. In the light of these events, we are more convinced than ever of the fundamental truth of these six principles. It is abundantly clear that they cannot be ignored with impunity.

Because of our involvement in this situation, as citizens and religious leaders, it has seemed to many Atlanta clergymen that some further statement on their part is appropriate. Out of that conviction comes this second statement. Once more we speak as individual citizens of Georgia and of the United States, having authority to represent no one other than ourselves. Once more we speak in humility and penitence. At the same time, we speak out of the deep conviction of our souls as to what is right. We believe some facts are now so clear as to throw additional light upon the problems which confront us.

I. It is clearer now than ever before that, at all costs, freedom of speech must be preserved. During the year which has past, it has not become easier to speak the truth concerning our situation. There are still forces which seek to deny freedom of thought and of expression to all who do not insist upon maintaining a rigid pattern of segregation. Economic reprisals, social ostracism, and even physical violence are constant threats to those who do not conform. Such threats strike at the very heart of democracy. As we insist upon the right of honest conviction—whether right or wrong—to be heard, we would pay tribute to the courageous individuals and groups in various walks of life who have insisted that our problem must be faced in a spirit of realism, of sanity, and of good will.

II. It is clearer now than ever before that we must obey the law. Those who insist that the decision of the Supreme Court on segregation in the public schools has no binding force do great injury to our people. The Supreme Court's interpretation of the Constitution has the effect of law in our country. It is possible for that Court to err, just as it is possible for Congress to enact bad laws. The citizens of our country have the right to work through legal processes to secure the correction of judicial errors or the repeal of undersirable legislation. They do not have the right to defy laws simply because they personally hold them to be unwise or harmful. A policy of obeying only those laws or those rulings of the Court with which we agree leads inevitably to anarchy. It is time for us to face to the fact that, under the ruling of the Supreme Court, made in the discharge of its constitutional authority, enforced segregation in the public schools is now without support in, and contrary to, national law. At times in her history the church has opposed civil law in the name of the claims of the higher laws of God. However, we believe that the Constitution of the United States in its provisions for human rights in in accord with divine law, and we must, therefore, learn to live with and under the law.

We do not believe in the wisdom of massive integration and are sincerely opposed to the amalgamation of the races. We reaffirm our conviction that the integrity of each race should be maintained on a basis of mutual esteem and free choice, rather than of force. There are some areas in which some integration in schools at this time would be possible without insurmountable difficulty, as has already been demonstrated in certain sections of the South, while there are other areas where such integration would involve needless hardship and grave danger. We have the hope that if our leaders will offer evidence of good faith toward providing constitutional rights for all citizens the Federal Government will be willing to leave the working out of details in local hands. We believe it is possible under the ruling of the Supreme Court for States to take reasonable steps to comply with the law of the land and, at the same time, give due consideration to local situations and avoid an indiscriminate desegregation of the public schools.

III. It is clearer now than ever before that the public school system must be preserved: Many of our people have been led to believe that through some ficticious legal device we could close our public schools and still provide for public education through tax funds. Recent developments in Arkansas and Virginia serve to make it abundantly clear that any such hope is based solely upon wishful thinking. The choice which confronts us now is either the end of an enforced segregation in public schools or no public schools whatever. We are alarmed to note that many political leaders are apparently willing to offer no better solution than the closing of public schools and the destruction of public education in order to maintain what has been inappropriately described as "our sacred way of life." It is inconceivable that the South should deliberately destroy its dearly bought system of public education. The results of such action in the impoverishment of countless lives, in the loss to our section, even from a purely economic viewpoint, would be a tragedy of the first magnitude. It is not likely that the South would ever recover fully from the consequences of such action. Obviously, the closing of the public schools means a small and favored portion of our youth would be educated in private institutions, while the great majority, white and Negro, would receive no school training worthy of the name. No democratic society can tolerate that situation, nor do we believe our citizens wish to sacrifice the welfare of our youth.

In this connection we would voice an emphatic protest against any suggestion that church property be used as a means of circumventing the law of the Nation. The churches and synagogues owe a tremendous debt to the State and this we believe they would gladly repay in any legitimate way possible. There are times when the educational equipment of the churches should be offered to supplement the public school buildings in providing space for our growing school population, provided that the segregation of church and state shall always be recognized and maintained in such an agreement. We concur that churches and synagogues have the right, as they have always had, to engage as they may deem wise in educational enterprise in the interest of their constituencies. We believe, however, their facilities should not be offered nor demanded as a means for defying the constituted authority of our National Government.

IV. It is clearer now than ever before that hatred and scorn for those of another race, or for those who hold a position different from our own can never be justified. All hatred between races and groups within society carries with it the constant threat of violence and bloodshed, as has been evidenced by the bombing of churches, synagogues, and schools even while this statement was being prepared. Defiance of one law leads to disrespect for all law. We would call upon our political leaders scrupulously to avoid the type of inflammatory utterance which has characterized too many public pronouncements in recent months and to exert an influence for sanity, for justice, and for kindness. We believe that multitudes of voters in the South as in all America are far more prepared to respond to and support fairminded and statesmanlike attitudes and policies in political life than these men have realized. In any event, political power is by no means so important as to justify its attainment by the sacrifice of justice, of kindness, and of truth, and by the unleashing of these emotions which threaten the very life of our people.

V. It is clearer now than ever before that communication between responsible leaders of the races must be maintained. The time of danger is also the time of opportunity. It may well be that we are passing through that darkest hour which comes just before the dawn. Never has there been greater need than now for men of good will in both races to voice their convictions, to exert their influence, and to maintain open lines of communication. We are heartened by the intelligent concern and struggle of an increasing number of groups who are facing the issue and its implications. We are likewise heartened by the constructive results which are coming from those lines of communication which do exist between the races.

VI. It is clearer now than ever before that our difficulties cannot be solved in our own strength or in human wisdom but only through prayer, obedience to God, and under His blessing: The situation which confronts us is one which calls for sincere penitence, for earnest prayer, for clear thought, and for courageous action.

Believing sincerely in the principles set forth in this statement, we therefore propose the following practical steps:

1. We appeal to our churches and synagogues to encourage and promote within their fellowship a free and intelligent discussion of the issues we confront. We believe such discussion should and would give careful consideration to the moral, spiritual, and legal aspects of the crisis we face in our beloved Southland.

2. We appeal to our community and State leaders to give their most creative thought to maintaining a sound public school plan. Such plan must be consistent with the law of the land, respect and preserve the rights of all citizens, and assure the preservation of our system of public education.

3. We request the appointment of a citizens' commission to preserve the harmony of our community. The public officials of our city have earned the tribute of the Nation for their refusal to condone violence and their efforts to realize worthy race relations. We believe that in the future the need will be great for the support of calm, intelligent public opinion. Atlanta possesses business, civic, educational, legal, political, and religious leadership of the quality to afford this support. We therefore request that representatives of this leadership from the races involved be formed into a citizens' commission to advise and assist in maintaining harmony and good will among all our citizens.

Every section of our State also possesses the same able leadership. We therefore believe that the appointment of a similar citizens' commission by the State administration would serve to preserve harmony among the citizens of Georgia.

We call upon all citizens to unite with us in dedicating ourselves to the solution of our problems humbly, patiently, in a spirit of realism, and with God's help.

METHODIST SEGREGATION RESOLUTION—STATEMENT BY THE COUNCIL OF METHODIST BISHOPS ON SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

In November 1954 the bishops in their message to the church gave formal support to the decision of the Supreme Court of May 17, 1954, abolishing segregation in the public school system. In that statement, we affirmed that the ruling of the High Court was in keeping with the attitude of the Methodist Church as expressed in its official pronouncements, both in the social creed and in the episcopal address of 1952. The pronouncements were reaffirmed in the general conference of 1956.

DIFFICULTIES NOTED

In addition, the general conference of 1956, apparently anticipating the difficulties which would be involved in the enforcement of these decisions, approved the following statement with respect to the decisions of the Supreme Court relative to segregation:

"The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States relative to segregation make necessary far-reaching and often difficult community adjustments throughout the Nation. We call upon our people to effect these adjustments in all good faith, with brotherliness and patience. In doing this, all racial groups must be willing to admit their imperfections and seek to correct them. Let these things, however, be done in love lest the cause of Christ suffer at our hands."

We reaffirm our support of the Supreme Court in the decisions relative to segregation in the public school system, and earnestly urge all our people to accept the rulings of the courts in good faith. We seek with the guidance of the Holy Spirit to create that kind of social climate which will work toward the elimination of friction between any and all racial groups and ultimately achieve the realization of Christian brotherhood in all community relationships—North and South and everywhere in the world. We heartily commend those lay people, pastors, and bishops who demonstrated Christian courage in critical areas. In these days of extreme tensions we commend our people who, while not always sharing the same attitudes on integration, are determined to demonstrate in their own lives the qualities of understanding, tolerance, and brotherhood.

We are disturbed by a growing disregard of law evidenced by the bombing of synagogues, churches, schools, and even private dwellings. We would remind our people that equal justice can be had only under law. To obey the law only when it suits us is to invite others to do likewise and that ultimately leads to anarchy. We therefore call upon our people to treat obedience to and respect for law as a Christian moral obligation, and to see to it that, if and when any law needs to be revised, strengthened, or eliminated, it can be done not by resort to force or violence but by legally established legislative procedure.

BISHOP'S INTEGRATION STATEMENT—DISCRIMINATION AND THE CHRISTIAN CONSCIENCE

Fifteen years ago, when this Nation was devoting its energies to a world war designed to maintain human freedom, the Catholic bishops of the United States issued a prayerful warning to their fellow citizens. We called for the extension of full freedom within the confines of our beloved country.

Specifically, we noted the problems faced by Negroes in obtaining the rights that are theirs as Americans. The statement of 1943 said in part:

"In the Providence of God there are among us millions of fellow citizens of the Negro race. We owe to these fellow citizens, who have contributed so largely to the development of our country, and for whose welfare history imposes on us a special obligation of justice, to see that they have in fact the rights which are given them in our Constitution. This means not only political equality, but also fair economic and educational opportunities, a just share in public welfare projects, good housing without exploitation, and a full chance for the social advancement of their race."

In the intervening years, considerable progress was made in achieving these goals. The Negro race, brought to this country in slavery, continued its quiet but determined march toward the goal of equal rights and equal opportunity.

During and after the Second World War, great and even spectacular advances were made in the obtaining of voting rights, good education, better paying jobs, and adequate housing. Through the efforts of men of good will, of every race and creed and from all parts of the Nation, the barriers of prejudice and discrimination were slowly but inevitably eroded.

MARCH IS SLOWED

Because this method of quiet conciliation produced such excellent results, we have preferred the path of action to that of exhortation. Unfortunately, however, it appears that in recent years the issues have become confused and the march toward justice and equality has been slowed if not halted in some areas. The transcendent moral issues involved have become obscured, and possibly forgotten.

Our Nation now stands divided by the problem of compulsory segregation of the races and the opposing demand for racial justice. No region of our land is immune from strife and division resulting from this problem.

In one area, the key issue may concern the schools. In another it may be conflicts over housing. Job discrimination may be the focal point in still other sectors. But all these issues have one main point in common. They reflect the determination of our Negro people, and we hope the overwhelming majority of our white citizens, to see that our colored citizens obtain their full rights as given to them by God, the Creator of all, and guaranteed by the democratic traditions of our Nation.

There are many facets to the problems raised by the question for racial justice. There are issues of law, of history, of economics, and of sociology. There are questions of procedure and technique. There are conflicts in cultures. Volumes have been written on each of these phases.

Their importance we do not deny. But the time has come, in our considered and prayerful judgment, to cut through the maze of secondary or less essential issues and to come to the heart of the problem.

The heart of the race question is moral and religious. It concerns the rights of man and our attitude toward our fellow man. If our attitude is governed by the great Christian law of love of neighbor and respect for his rights, then we can work out harmoniously the techniques for making legal, educational, economic, and social adjustments. But if our hearts are poisoned by hatred, or even by indifference toward the welfare and rights of our fellow men, then our Nation faces a grave internal crisis.

No one who bears the name of Christian can deny the universal love of God for all mankind. When our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ "took on the form of man" (Philippians 2: 7) and walked among men, He taught as the first two laws of life the love of God and the love of fellow man. "By this shall all men know that you are My disciples, that you have love one for the other" (John 13: 35). He offered His life in sacrifice for all mankind. His parting mandate to His followers was to "teach all nations" (Matthew 28: 19).

Our Christian faith is of its nature universal. It knows not the distinctions of race, color, or nationhood. The missionaries of the church have spread throughout the world, visiting with equal impartiality nations such as China and India, whose ancient cultures antedate the coming of the Saviour, and the primitive tribes of the Americas.

NO BOUNDS

The love of Christ and the love of the Christian knows no bounds. In the words of Pope Pius XII, addressed to American Negro publishers 12 years ago, "All men are brothered in Jesus Christ, for He, though God, became also man, became a member of the human family, a brother of all" (May 27, 1946).

Even those who do not accept our Christian tradition should at least acknowledge that God has implanted in the souls of all men some knowledge of the natural moral law and a respect for its teachings. Reason alone taught philosophers through the ages respect for the sacred dignity of each human being and the fundamental rights of man.

Every man has an equal right to life, to justice before the law, to marry and rear a family under human conditions, and to an equitable opportunity to use the goods of this earth for his needs and those of his family.

From these solemn truths, there follow certain conclusions vital for a proper approach to the problems that trouble us today.

CREATED EQUAL

First, we must repeat the principle—embodied in our Declaration of Independence—that all men are equal in the sight of God. By equal we mean that they are created by God and redeemed by His Divine Son, that they are bound by His law, and that God desires them as His friends in the eternity of Heaven. This fact confers upon all men human dignity and human rights.

Men are unequal in talent and achievement. They differ in culture and personal characteristics. Some are saintly, some seem to be evil, most are men of good will, though beset with human frailty. On the basis of personal differences we may distinguish among our fellow men, remembering always the admonition: "Let him who is without sin * * * cast the first stone * * *" (John 8: 7).

But discrimination based on the accidental fact of race or color, and as such injurious to human rights regardless of personal qualities or achievements, cannot be reconciled with the truth that God has created all men with equal rights and equal dignity.

BOUND TO LOVE

Secondly, we are bound to love our fellow man. The Christian love we bespeak is not a matter of emotional likes or dislikes. It is a firm purpose to do good to all men, to the extent that ability and opportunity permit.

Among all races and national groups, class distinctions are inevitably made on the basis of like-mindedness or a community of interests. Such distinctions are normal and constitute a universal social phenomenon.

They are accidental, however, and are subject to change as conditions change. It is unreasonable and injurious to the rights of others that a factor such as race, by and of itself, should be made a cause of discrimination and a basis for unequal treatment in our mutual relations.

SEGREGATION OPPOSED

The question then arises: Can enforced segregation be reconciled with the Christian view of our fellow man? In our judgment it cannot, and this for two fundamental reasons.

1. Legal segregation, or any form of compulsory segregation, in itself and by its very nature imposes a stigma of inferiority upon the segregated people. Even if the now obsolete Court doctrine of "separate but equal" had been carried out to the fullest extent, so that all public and semipublic facilities were in fact equal, there is nonetheless the judgment that an entire race, by the sole fact of race and regardless of individual qualities, is not fit to associate on equal terms with members of another race.

We cannot reconcile such a judgment with the Christian view of man's nature and rights. Here again it is appropriate to cite the language of Pope Pius XII: "God did not create a human family made up of segregated, dissociated, mutually independent members. No; He would have them all united by the bond of total love of Him and consequent self-dedication to assisting each other to maintain that bond intact" (September 7, 1956).

2. It is a matter of historical fact that segregation in our country has led to oppressive conditions and the denial of basic human rights for the Negro. This is evident in the fundamental fields of education, job opportunity, and housing. Flowing from these areas of neglect and discrimination are problems of health and the sordid train of evils so often associated with the consequent slum conditions. Surely Pope Pius XII must have had these conditions in mind when he said just 2 months ago: "It is only too well known, alas, to what excesses pride of race and racial hate can lead. The church has always been energetically opposed to attempts of genocide or practices arising from what is called the "color bar" (September 5, 1958).

EVILS USED AS EXCUSES

One of the tragedies of racial oppression is that the evils we have cited are being used as excuses to continue the very conditions that so strongly fostered such evils.

Today we are told that Negroes, Indians, and also some Spanish-speaking Americans differ too much in culture and achievements to be assimilated in our schools, factories, and neighborhoods. Some decades back the same charge was made against the immigrant—Irish, Jewish, Italian, Polish, Hungarian, German, Russian. In both instances differences were used by some as a basis for discrimination and even for bigoted ill-treatment. The immigrant, fortunately, has achieved his rightful status in the American community. Economic opportunity was wide open and educational equality was not denied to him.

Negro citizens seek these same opportunities. They wish an education that does not carry with it any stigma of inferiority. They wish economic advancement based on merit and skill. They wish their civil rights as American citizens. They wish acceptance based upon proved ability and achievement. No one who truly loves God's children will deny them this opportunity.

WORK NOT EASY

To work for this principle amid passions and misunderstandings will not be easy. It will take courage. But quiet and persevering courage has always been the mark of a true follower of Christ.

We urge that concrete plans in this field be based on prudence. Prudence may be called a virtue that inclines us to view problems in their proper perspective. It aids us to use the proper means to secure our aim.

The problems we inherit today are rooted in decades, even centuries, of custom and cultural patterns. Changes in deep-rooted attitudes are not made overnight. When we are confronted with complex and far-reaching evils, it is not a sign of weakness or timidity to distinguish among remedies and reforms. Some changes are more necessary than others. Some are relatively easy to achieve. Others seem impossible at this time. What may succeed in one area may fail in another.

USE WISDOM

It is a sign of wisdom, rather than weakness, to study carefully the problems we face, to prepare for advances, and to bypass the nonessential if it interferes with essential progress.

We may well deplore a gradualism that is merely a cloak for inaction. But we equally deplore rash impetuosity that would sacrifice the achievements of decades in ill-timed and ill-considered ventures.

In concrete matters we distinguish between prudence and inaction by asking the question: Are we sincerely and earnestly acting to solve these problems? We distinguish between prudence and rashness by seeking the prayerful and considered judgment of experienced counselors who have achieved success in meeting similar problems.

SEIZE LEADERSHIP

For this reason we hope and earnestly pray that responsible and sober-minded Americans of all religious faiths, in all areas of our land, will seize the mantle of leadership from the agitator and the racist. It is vital that we act now and act decisively. All must act quietly, courageously and prayerfully before it is too late.

For the welfare of our Nation we call upon all to root out from their hearts bitterness and hatred. The tasks we face are indeed difficult. But hearts inspired by Christian love will surmount these difficulties.

Clearly, then, these problems are vital and urgent. May God give this Nation the grace to meet the challenge it faces. For the sake of generations of future Americans, and indeed of all humanity, we cannot fail.

EXCISE TAX ON TELEPHONE USE

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, American people should resent paying each month a 10-percent excise tax as telephone users. In 1941, while I was serving my third term in the House of Representatives, this tax was introduced and passed as a wartime measure to raise additional revenue to meet the threat of aggression from Adolf Hitler's Germany.

I have always been opposed to this excise, or sales, tax, which places a heavy burden on persons making telephone calls. Telephone service is certainly a household, as well as a business, necessity.

This sort of an excise tax is discriminatory. It was imposed on the American people at the same time taxes on luxury items, such as nightclub entertainment, jewelry, expensive furs, and liquor, were imposed. I assert taxing telephone users in the home, factories, and offices is not the same thing as taxing these luxury items. I assert this 10-percent excise tax against telephone users is, in reality, an abominable tax.

Furthermore, admittedly, telephone service is a public utility service. Yet, do other public utilities—water, electricity, and gas—suffer by the imposition of such a discriminatory tax? The Ohio Bell Telephone Co. and other telephone companies are, in reality, not the actual sufferers from the imposition of this discriminatory tax. The sufferers are the citizens who use telephones in their homes and in their places of employment. This sort of sales tax, or excise tax, violates every sound principle of just taxation. It is regressive. It burdens most those who have the least. It is not in accord with that sound principle of just taxation that taxes should be levied by our Government upon its people based upon their ability to pay.

Mr. President, the urgency of bringing this matter to the attention of the public is heightened and increased by the present proposal to make this sales, or excise, tax a permanent burden on those who use telephones.

Here is highlighted one great problem presented whenever the Congress is called on to levy new taxes. Despite statements that such Federal sales, or excise, taxes are only temporary in character to meet a certain emergency, the merciless facts are that once a tax is promulgated and enforced, despite statements to the contrary, it is usually continued on the statute books and remains there as a permanent form of taxation.

As Ohio Congressman at Large, I voted against the imposition of a sales tax upon purchases made in the District of Columbia. That was many years ago. It was then stated that there was a necessity for a 2-percent sales tax to meet a temporary emergency, and that when the emergency came to an end the tax would be repealed. The cruel facts are, this sales tax in the District of Columbia—the same as the 3-percent sales tax in Ohio—has become a permanent form of taxation.

Persons who are poor, or in moderate circumstances, spend all of their incomes for living purposes, and they bear a greater burden than do those persons who receive high incomes and save a substantial portion of their earnings.

Mr. President, during the year 1957 this atrocious telephone excise tax cost customers of the Ohio Bell Telephone Co. $21 million. This tax was passed on to customers by the Ohio Bell Telephone Co. in addition to the increased charges they had to pay for telephone service and for long distance and suburban calls. The facts are that $52 million in local, State and Federal taxes were paid that year, 1957, directly by the Ohio Bell Telephone Co. This excise tax burden is equally regressive and indefensible wherever it is applied to telephone users, and lays its heavy burden on all our citizens.

It is later than we think. Now is the time to end this unfair, detestable, burdensome and discriminatory excise tax. If we fail to do this now, this tax will burden our people for many years to come. In fact, it will, without doubt, burden them permanently.

Furthermore, Mr. President, at this time I give notice that I am unalterably opposed to the imposition of any general Federal sales tax, as has been advocated by the National Association of Manufacturers.

Mr. President, let us enforce economy in Government. Economy in Government, like economy in an individual, I apprehend, means going without some of the things we would like to have but do not absolutely need.

Then let us plug loopholes in our present revenue laws so as to channel additional tax payments into the Federal Treasury; and at the same time let us eliminate unfair, unsound and atrocious excise taxes such as the tax to which I have specifically referred today.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMPENSATION FOR A CERTAIN PERIOD TO EMPLOYEES OF FORMER SENATOR JOHN D. HOBLITZELL, JR.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 41, Calendar No. 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 41) reported by Mr. HENNINGS from the Committee on Rules and Administration on January 23, 1959, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the administrative and clerical assistants appointed by former Senator John D. Hoblitzell, Jr., of West Virginia, who were carried on the Senate payroll on November 4, 1958, salary for services in his office for the period November 5, 1958, through December 4, 1958, or for so much of that time through December 4, 1958, as they were not otherwise gainfully employed, at their respective rates of salary as of November 4, 1958.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 41.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, this resolution provides that payment shall be made of salaries to administrative and clerical assistants appointed by former Senator John D. Hoblitzell, Jr., of West Virginia, for 30 days following the termination of his service in the Senate on November 4, 1958, at their respective rates of salary as they were listed on the Senate payroll as of that date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REVISION AND PRINTING OF SENATE MANUAL FOR THE USE OF 86TH CONGRESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 36.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules and Administration be, and it is hereby, directed to prepare a revised edition of the Senate Rules and Manual for the use of the Eighty-sixth Congress, that said Rules and Manual shall be printed as a Senate document, and that one thousand six hundred and fifty additional copies shall be printed and bound, of which one thousand copies shall be for the Senate, two hundred copies shall be for the use of the Committee on Rules and Administration, and the remaining four hundred and fifty copies shall be bound in full morocco, tagged as to contents, and delivered as may be directed by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the resolution is self-explanatory. It merely directs the preparation of a revised edition of the Senate Rules and Manual for the use of the 86th Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 36) was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE 60TH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 37.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the 60th annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended April 1, 1957, be printed, with an illustration, as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the resolution merely provides that the 60th annual report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 37) was agreed to.

LAURA LECETA SADLER

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 38.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Laura Leceta Sadler, widow of Harry W. Sadler, an employee of the Senate at the time of death, a sum equal to seven and one-half months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the resolution is self-explanatory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 38) was agreed to.

COMMEMORATION BY CONGRESS OF THE 150TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 57.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 57, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11 o'clock antemeridian, on Thursday, February 12, 1959.

That the Committee on Arrangements, created pursuant to Public Law 85–775, is empowered to make suitable arrangements for fitting and proper exercises for the joint session of Congress hereby authorized and, in accordance with provisions of Public Law 85–775, to issue appropriate invitations to officials, dignitaries, and other persons to join in this commemoration.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, last year Congress agreed upon a resolution to provide for this joint service on February 12, 1959, which marks the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. I believe that this will be one of the outstanding events of the year, and in the history of the country, for that matter, because generally Lincoln has been regarded as the great contribution of this country to all the annals of mankind. I believe it was H. G. Wells who described Abraham Lincoln as one of the five greatest ever produced by all mankind.

Therefore I am glad that there will be a joint session of Congress, and that it will be implemented by dinners and observances and celebrations, to mark the sesquicentennial year throughout the country. Therefore I fully concur in the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 57) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, announces the appointment of the two Senators from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] as members on the part of the Senate of the Committee on Arrangements for the joint session on February 12, 1959, to commemorate the sesquicentennial of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, authorized by Public Law 775 of the 85th Congress.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

On motion of Mr. DIRKSEN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That in the listing of the Republican membership on the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, the name of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] be listed following the name of the senior Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH].

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM DURING LINCOLN WEEK

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to query the majority leader concerning our discussions and conclusions regarding Lincoln Week. The birth anniversary, February 12, falls on a Thursday. As has been the custom in the past, our Members will accept invitations to return to their States and districts and elsewhere for the purpose of making suitable testimonial speeches. I express the hope to the majority leader that most if not all of that week could probably be devoted to that purpose, so that there would be no business which would require attendance and that there would be no record votes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The minority leader states the situation correctly. We hope that we can have as large attendance as possible at the joint session on the 12th of February. I do not anticipate any rollcall votes during the week beginning Monday, the 9th of February, and ending Saturday, the 14th of February. We will have the joint session on Thursday, and probably go over from Thursday, the 12th of February, to Monday, the 16th of February. So far as the majority leader and the minority leader are able to control the situation, all Members of the Senate may be on notice that we will not schedule any votes and we will resist any as long as possible.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have already had inquiries about the week of February 22, marking the birth of the founder of our country.

February 22 happens to fall on Sunday. I am not quite certain what the plans and programs will be, but I am confident that in one section of the country and another there will be dinners and observances to mark George Washington's birthday. I do not know whether the majority leader had in mind anything concerning the latter part of the week ending February 21, and perhaps the first day or two of the following week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would not anticipate any difficulty about Saturday, February 21, or Monday, February 23, although at this time I would not want to say that Senators will be protected by our not having yea-and-nay votes. I will speak to the distinguished minority leader about this matter as soon as the calendar committees advise me what bills they think will be reported to the Senate.

We are very desirous of passing the housing bill and perhaps the airport bill before Lincoln Week. If necessary, we will ask for a Saturday session in an attempt to have some of that proposed legislation passed before Senators leave the city for observances during Lincoln Week.

Plans for the week of February 22 are not firm, but I will try to make arrangements which will be agreeable to the minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 51 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, in accordance with the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Thursday, January 29, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Addresses Delivered at Testimonial Dinner in Honor of Leslie L. Biffle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 28, 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and myself, I desire to make a brief statement and to propose a request.

On Tuesday evening, January 20, 1959, a testimonial dinner was given at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington in honor of the Honorable Leslie L. Biffle, former Secretary of the Senate, in commemoration of his 50th year in Washington.

We are advised by the Public Printer that the remarks made on that occasion exceed the 2-page limit, and that the estimate of the cost of printing is $351. Notwithstanding that fact, we ask unanimous consent that these remarks be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, Leslie Biffle is by all odds one of the most gracious and obliging personalities I have ever encountered in my lifetime. He has been completely unselfish, regardless of political identity, in being kind and helpful to everyone he might serve. The testimonial dinner in his honor was richly deserved, as were all the encomiums which were spread on the record.

So I am delighted in joining the majority leader in asking that these proceedings be made a matter of record in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I thank my delightful friend from Illinois for his eloquent tribute to this faithful public servant. I was privileged to attend the dinner, although I arrived there just before it concluded. I have never seen a dinner in Washington which was attended by more members of both parties who felt so sincerely that they wanted to honor a public servant. The distinguished minority leader has expressed better than I can how all of us feel about this former officer of the Senate.

There being no objection, the proceedings were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

J. HOWARD MCGRATH. Ladies and gentlemen, the invocation will be offered by the Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, Chaplain of the U.S. Senate. Please stand.

Dr. HARRIS. Let us lift our hearts in prayer. Oh Thou God of the best we aspire to be in our highest hours, we are grateful for the sacrament of friendship, and for the contagion of a friendliness which is not mixed with the alloy of self-seeking.

In a world where so much is marred by unworthy covetousness, we thank Thee for the abiding beauty of a care for one's fellows, pictured in the Book of Ages, where Thy servant, Saint Paul, tells of a love that is patient and kind, that is not jealous nor boastful, that is not arrogant and rude, that does not insist on its own way, that is not irritable nor resentful; a love that does not rejoice in the wrong, but rejoices in the right.

We come this hour with glad and grateful hearts to honor a friend whose record fits this scriptural frame and who, across the years, has lived in his house by the side of the road, and been a friend of man, who has a place of affection in the hearts of a host who have felt the warmth of his selfless interest in public and private life, across fruitful years for a half century in this Capital City.

With deep appreciation for all he means to so many, we salute this radiant friend in whose heart there is malice toward none and charity for all, and who, in the school of the years, has learned—

"To think without confusion clearly,
To act from honest motives purely,
To love his fellow man sincerely,
To trust in God and heaven securely."

We come in the name of the Master of all good workmen. Amen.

(The National Anthem.)

J. HOWARD MCGRATH. I now present on behalf of every and all persons that are here tonight, in force and on our behalf, Mrs. Perle Mesta.

Mrs. PERLE MESTA. My father always taught me that a woman—a mother or sisters, or a wife—was behind any man's accomplishments, and tonight we have the charming wife of Mr. Biffle, and I am delighted to present these roses, on behalf of this committee, to Mrs. Biffle.

J. HOWARD MCGRATH. We will now proceed with the purpose which brought us here—that is, to have a dinner.

A panoramic picture of the guests tonight; the camera is in that direction, directly opposite me; if you could give your attention for 2 minutes, the picture would be concluded.

Will you please cooperate in the taking of these panoramic pictures. This is not a sound picture, so upstairs you can make as much noise as you like.

Gentlemen and ladies, you will find on your table a sheet entitled "Friends of Leslie Biffle." These are enclosed in a cellophane envelope. It is our hope that each of you will sign his name, carefully preserving these sheets so that they can be incorporated in a volume that will be presented to Mr. Biffle as a remembrance of those who are here tonight. So, if you have not already signed your sheet, please do so now, reenclose it in the cellophane envelopes, and the waiters or members of the committee will collect it. The sheets that you have signed, friends of Leslie Biffle, that are to be included in a volume to be presented to him which have not already been collected, please see that your waiter picks them up and brings them to the head table.

Ladies and gentlemen, we must be on with our business. I would like now to present those who are seated at what is commonly known as the head table. There is no significance about the personages of those who are here and are about to be presented; they are symbolic of the many beloved friends of our guest of honor. If you will bear with me I will ask each of them to stand for your approval.

To my left, Mr. Felton M. Johnston, the Secretary of the Senate; Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, the grandma of the Democratic Party; Mr. Paul Butler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee; Mrs. Thomas C. Clark; Rev. Frederick Brown Harris; Mrs. Perle Mesta; Robert V. Fleming; Mrs. Samuel F. Pryor, Jr.; Senator Lister Hill; Mrs. Styles Bridges; Justice Wm. O. Douglas; Mrs. John L. McClellan.

On the other side of the table I would like to present Mr. James W. Carkner, chairman of the board of Pepsi-Cola of which our honored guest is a distinguished member; Mrs. Felton M. Johnston; John W. Holton, the Administrative Assistant to the Speaker of the House of Representatives; Mrs. Wm. O. Douglas; the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Wm. P. Rogers; Mrs. Frederick Brown Harris; the Honorable Joseph W. Martin, Jr.; Mrs. J. Howard McGrath; Hon. Styles Bridges; Mrs. Lister Hill; Justice Tom C. Clark; Mrs. Leslie Biffle.

Now, it becomes my very pleasant duty and honor to present to you my cochairman of this magnificent tribute to our honored guest. There are happy privileges that come to one in a lifetime but none more rewarding than to have as a working companion, in a cause that is so wonderfully rewarding as this we are engaged in tonight, such as I have had. There have been no conspiracies betwixt nor among us save one—I agreed with my cochairman that he would seat the Democrats and I would seat the Republicans—so if any of you have a problem about where you are or why you are, blame each of us and find out where you are. I now want to introduce to this gathering which has been a real effort on behalf of those who are in attendance, and those who could not be here for many and varied reasons, the man who has contributed the most to making this affair the bipartisan, nonpartisan, triple partisan, whatever partisan you have—our cochairman, Sam Pryor.

SAMUEL F. PRYOR, JR. Thank you Mr. Chairman. Honored guests and distinguished guests and friends of our honored guest, Reverend Harris, that world you spoke of, Mrs. Pryor and I have had the privilege of seeing nearly every living corner of it and I can honestly say it's a beautiful world. In fact, I sometimes think we have Heaven on earth here, with the exception of one thing—people. People cause trouble, confusion, and unhappiness. But, tonight, tonight we have one of the great exceptions to the rule. Our guest of honor has brought happiness to nearly everybody in this room. He's brought kindness, regardless of party, regardless of whether you're big or small, he's been kind to us. And also we have another person of this category. We are very fortunate to have him. He is in the midst right now of making the United States a better place to live, not only for us, but, more important, for our children. And he comes from the same background; in fact since my party has been referred to, may I say he has a great many of the qualities of Abraham Lincoln. It is a great privilege the committee has given me to introduce to you all our toastmaster, Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, Sam, Mr. Cochairman, Les and Mrs. Biffle, distinguished guests, my colleagues in Congress, ladies and gentlemen. I should like also to thank the entire committee on arrangements and to express my deep appreciation for the privilege of serving as your toastmaster this evening. To have the pleasure of participating in this program in that capacity is a very high honor, indeed, and one that I shall greatly cherish because I regard this testimonial dinner as one of the most outstanding functions of this kind ever held in the Capital of the United States.

I know this is a happy occasion for all of us. We are here to do honor to a very dear friend and to a truly great American, on this the 50th anniversary of his entering into public service with the National Congress here in Washington. This magnificent audience, your presence here now, is an eloquent tribute to him who has earned our eternal admiration and esteem by the unselfish and devoted service he has so faithfully and abundantly given to his country.

Naturally, I am doubly proud, because he is a fellow Arkansan. Truly he is a beloved son of the great wonder State and one in whom all of her citizens take justifiable pride and in whom they are well pleased.

Our guest of honor first came to Washington in 1908 as secretary to the Honorable Robert Bruce Macon, Congressman from the First District of Arkansas. In that capacity his talents and qualities soon appeared and were recognized. They quickly attracted the attention and interest of Members of the Congress, and he was repeatedly called to serve in important positions in the U.S. Senate and in fact to almost every important non-Member position in that body, finally culminating in his being elected Secretary of the Senate in 1945 by the unanimous support and vote of both the Democrats and Republicans alike and later elected again to that same position in 1949. It was my privilege to place him in nomination before the Democratic conference on that latter occasion. I think some of the things that I said then at that time when there was no occasion like this in my mind nor contemplated, I think some of the things I said would bear repeating here this evening. I refer to his many years of faithfulness and devotion and loyalty to the Democratic Party, to the unexcelled highly capable and efficient service he has rendered in the many places of trust and responsibility he held, to his affable and matchless personality, and to his many courtesies and accommodations that have throughout the years indelibly endeared him to the hearts of all of us.

But, there is still more to the story. In the drama of national life many personalities have from time to time played impressive roles on the Washington scene. Presidents, Members of Congress, Cabinet members, and other Government officials, come and go. While they are here they make their influence felt in politics and on the affairs of our Government and the Nation, some of them only to a small degree, and others with potent effects and results. During the time our honored guest served as secretary to the minority and as secretary to the majority, particularly when the Democrats were in power, as Secretary of the Senate, but few men, if any, have had equal or greater influence than he was able to bring to bear in the direction of forces of the Democratic Party or in the formulation of policies and the enactment of laws by the National Congress.

His counsel has eagerly been sought by legislators, by administrators, by diplomats, and by military leaders and even by Presidents of the United States. He has been a counselor and adviser, a confidant, whose opinions and judgment were respected and often followed by those in the highest positions of trust and responsibility. I truly feel inspired on this occasion, but I must not, of course, monopolize the time. It wasn't expected that I should make even these many remarks, but I couldn't refrain from doing so.

Now, before I introduce our other speakers, I may say that there have been literally thousands of messages received from friends all over the Nation, and it is impossible for the presiding official at this dinner to read all of them, or to even call the names of the large number of friends who join us here tonight in this way of paying tribute to our honored guest. But, I shall read some few that I think would be of interest to you and that I think you would like to hear. The first is:

"Regret I cannot be present this evening, to join your many friends, in tendering you this well deserved recognition. My kindest regards and best wishes always.

"J. MILLARD TAWES,
"Governor of Maryland."

"A new Governor does not have much time to travel. This becomes extremely regretful on the occasion such as this, when so many friends are joined in honoring Leslie Biffle on the 50th anniversary of his arrival in Washington. Very few individuals have made so many friends during a lifetime. Very few people have had such an influence on the destiny of our fellow citizens.

"I join all of you in expressing to Leslie many happy returns of this momentous day.

"MICHAEL DI SALLE,
"Governor of Ohio."

"Because of a mandatory commitment here I regret that I cannot attend the testimonial dinner to Leslie Biffle so I have requested Dick Patterson, my commissioner of commerce and public events, to represent me. Leslie Biffle has been a distinguished public servant for many years. Among his many fine attributes is his capacity for friendship. He has friends everywhere because he himself is a friend. The list of his friendships ranges from ditchdiggers to leaders in law, industry, and politics, to statesmen, ambassadors, and scientists. Loyalty is in Les Biffle's bloodstream. He never forgets a friend, he never fails to reward one. I salute him with admiration and affection.

"ROBERT F. WAGNER,
"Mayor of the City of New York."

"It is a most fitting and well deserved recognition of an outstanding career, and of a man who has followed a creed of placing the welfare of others ahead of his own. May I add my hearty congratulations and best wishes. May I further say that I am proud to be among your many warm friends and admirers.

"FRANK E. MCKINNEY."

"I hope you will tell Les Biffle how sorry I am not to be in Washington for his testimonial dinner. He is getting just what he deserves.

"Regards,

"ADLAI E. STEVENSON."

Now I want to read you one from Arkansas:

"DEAR GENERAL MCGRATH: It is a real pleasure to enclose herewith a copy of a resolution which unanimously passed both houses of the Arkansas general assembly yesterday. I have signed the resolution and will transmit original copies, along with my signature, to the members of the general assembly to Mr. Biffle, as soon as the resolution is enrolled. I regret very much that I am unable to be present at the dinner tonight; however, it will be deeply appreciated if you will convey my personal congratulations and best wishes to Mr. Biffle, who is certainly one of Arkansas' most distinguished and favorite sons.

"Most sincerely,

"ORVAL E. FAUBUS,
"Governor."

May I read you the resolution?

"SIXTY-SECOND GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF ARKANSAS JOINT HOUSE AND SENATE RESOLUTION, JANUARY 19, 1959

"Whereas there will be a testimonial dinner honoring Leslie L. Biffle at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington, D.C., on Tuesday evening, January 20, 1959; and

"Whereas the Honorable Leslie L. Biffle is a native of Piggott, Clay County, Ark., from where he went to Washington in 1908 to distinguish himself and bring honor to his native State with 50 years of public service in the Nation's Capital; and

"Whereas the Honorable Leslie L. Biffle has become enshrined in the hearts of his fellow men through his great acts of mercy, compassion, brotherly love, and a benevolent spirit that has given joy and sustenance to thousands of people; and

"Whereas during this period of 50 years in which he worked in the service of his Government, of his country, and his fellow men, this son of Arkansas has constructed a place of greatness as he has moved with charm and warmth, trust, and dignity in the political arena; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 62d General Assembly of the State of Arkansas (the Senate concurring therein), That the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas does by unanimous action hereby commend their fellow citizen, the Honorable Leslie L. Biffle, for a half century of devotion in the service of democracy; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the testimonial committee dinner in Washington, D.C., to the Piggott Banner, in Piggott, Ark., to the Piggott Public Library, and to the Honorable Leslie L. Biffle of Washington, D. C."

Here is one that I know is from a dear, dear old friend:

"DEAR LES: Conditions have arisen which will prevent my making a trip east on the 20th as I had hoped. I congratulate you on the wonderful show of appreciation our friends are giving you. The Senate and the country never had a more faithful public servant than Leslie L. Biffle. I have never regretted anything more in my life than not being able to be with you on this occasion.

"Sincerely yours,

"HARRY S TRUMAN."

And, now I am happy to read a message from the highest authority in the land:

"DEAR LESLIE: I am sorry that I cannot join the friends who are with you this evening to congratulate you in person on your first 50 years in Washington. You have long been known as one of Washington's foremost citizens, noted for your warm personality, your readiness to be helpful, your professional efficiency and your loyal service. You have carved out a position that is unique in this city. Only a man of deep understanding, fine character, and a warm personality could have formed the many and warm friendships that enrich your life. Truly, you have done much to make Washington a better and more pleasant place in which to work and live. May the Lord in his providence keep you healthy and happy in the years to come.

"With best wishes to you and Mrs. Biffle.

"Sincerely,

"DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER."

I certainly am not going to take further time. We have a brief program arranged. Some of our speakers that had been invited are unable to be present. Quite some time ago, when this meeting was first initiated, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, graciously accepted an invitation to be present and to speak to us on this occasion. Subsequently there was arranged a state dinner at the White House, and, of course, you know what takes precedence in such a situation. So, our Mr. SAM, our beloved Speaker, is at the White House this evening, but he has here as his representative one who has already been introduced to you as his administrative assistant and whom I am proud to present again, Mr. John W. Holton.

JOHN W. HOLTON. Senator MCCLELLAN, distinguished guests and friends of Les Biffle: Les, I do not think we need to ring the bells tonight because the entire membership is already here.

I bring you the friendly and warm greetings of Speaker RAYBURN. If you have read the biography of the distinguished honor guest tonight and the biographies of many other illustrious statesmen of our time, the Speaker would have me remind you that if you really want to reach the pinnacle of success, you must have had some association with the House of Representatives.

Mr. Biffle, your charming lady: I extend to you my sincere congratulations on this happy occasion. My wish for you is that your life may be spared for long and useful service; that the path of life may lead you by still waters; that you will be healthy; that you will find a prosperous and strong America and the world in peace.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Mr. Holton. The gentleman I shall now present to you is now serving, I believe, his 17th consecutive term in the Congress of the United States. He has twice been Speaker of the House of Representatives, and is one of the best known, the most influential, and one of the most loved Republicans in the United States: I give to you, Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, the guest of honor and friends of Les Biffle, I am glad my good friend and neighbor Howard McGrath explained where he seated the Republicans. I was rather lost why a back seat Republican should be at the head table; but your explanation cleared that up most thoroughly. He did it from the kindness of his heart. You see we live only 12 miles apart. But what is the reason I am so happy to come? Because it gives me the privilege of paying a warm personal tribute to a man who through the years has won the affection, the regard, and the esteem of all who come in contact with him. He's a great American. He has given 50 years of service to our country. Think of the events that have happened in all those years, and realize that Les Biffle has played an important part in so many of them. My good friend JOHN McCLELLAN has stated he has been the confidant of Presidents. He has been the confidant of Senators and I can remember him 35 years ago in the early days when we House Members ventured into the rarefied atmosphere of the Senate—he would extend to us a helping hand. Now, of course, we go over there with the brusqueness of the modern age; because we have so many former House Members over there now. Sometimes we think we run the Senate. Well, at the critical moments they show us that we don't. But I find it a great privilege to come here tonight. It's a wonderful tribute to see this magnificent gathering, fine telegrams and messages, that have come from all over the country. They are heartening, they are warming. And they indicate to us the building of America is due to lives like Leslie Biffle's doing the everyday work, thoroughly, conscientiously, and with but one thought—what is best for America. Oh, my friends, as we face these critical years that are ahead, we need dedicated Americans, we need men of undoubted loyalty to our country, for that is the only way we are going to come through. It doesn't make much difference after all, whether we are Republicans or Democrats, the one great thought must be, "Are we doing what we honestly believe is best for America?" Are we doing our best to build this great country of ours? And so wherever I sit, in the back seat or the front seat, that shall be my purpose, because I love this country. It has done so much for all of us. I know it can't be written in the stars, that in this hour this great country shall fail. No, we are going to go forward, we're going to go forward because we have men like Les Biffle, men of stalwartness, men of courage and men of discernment. * * * As I looked over that bicycle over there, automobile I guess it is, it says: "The Arkansas Pollster," and Les, I know the results of your polling. Sometimes as a Republican, I rather resented the reports you brought back from the country, but I know one thing always, that your reports were thorough and you were a keen observer. And, so I say to you tonight, I wish you well, Les. You see all these people who have come here tonight to pay tribute to you and your wife. It must make you feel proud; it must make you feel happy. Because after all, material possessions may vanish; the financial wealth that men accumulate may disappear; but the real friends a man earns are enduring. They are the real wealth. Les, you're a millionaire in the friends that you and your wife have accumulated in your long 50 years of service. May God bless you and take care of you in the years ahead.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Congressman MARTIN. I certainly take back nothing I said about him, don't you agree with me?

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, our able and distinguished majority leader, in the Senate, was also to address the group this evening. He gladly accepted when the invitation was extended, and, unfortunately for us, he, too, is at a command performance at a state dinner down at the White House. But, he has a representative here, in the distinguished Senator from Alabama, one of the ablest men on the Hill. He is chairman of the important Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. He served some 15 years in the House of Representatives and is now serving in his fourth term in the United States Senate. I am pleased to present to you, my able distinguished colleague and friend, Hon. LISTER HILL.

Senator HILL. Mr. Toastmaster, Les Biffle, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, when I was called at the last moment, advised that our distinguished Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON could not be here tonight, and that our fine assistant leader, MIKE MANSFIELD, is ill with pneumonia and could not be here tonight, and therefore, I had been chosen to say a few words at this time, frankly I was frightened. And then I thought about Les Biffle, and I thought, "Well, there'll be no trouble about that speech, except that it will take all night to tell all the good things about Les Biffle." And, then I was reminded, my friends, that 2 years ago last fall, Les Biffle sent me out to Iowa to make some speeches in the campaign there and I was with this good gentleman and his good wife; we were going to a city about 100 miles north from Des Moines, the capital, the good lady was driving the car and I was sitting on the front seat with her and the good husband was sitting behind, when we got about 15 miles out of our appointed destination we ran into one of the hardest rains I have ever seen in my life. The rain really came down in sheets. Just at that time the automobile stopped. It had given out of gas. Fortunately, it stopped right at a farmer's driveway and the good husband and I got out, went into the farmer's house, and of course he gave us enough gas to go on into the city. But you can imagine that on our way in, we really gave that lady a good time about giving out of gas. That night after I had spoken and the meeting was over she came up to me, shook my hand and said, "Senator, I want to congratulate you. I gave out of gas but you certainly didn't."

Who is there here who knows where Piggott, Ark., is? Well, there are a few, but I tell you my friends, it's the place whence came Leslie Biffle to Washington and that was 50 years ago. Think of it, that was before most of us here this evening were even born. But, I want to say this about Les Biffle: all the ladies tell me that he's still young, charming, and captivating. He had his start, just as many of us did in the House of Representatives and then got demoted and came on over to the Senate. He fell under the eagle eye of that great statesman from Arkansas, Joe Robinson. Joe brought him to the Senate folding room; and ever since then Leslie Biffle has been a-busy folding good things for his friends, for the Democratic Party, and for our country.

During World War I, the War Department sent Leslie to France; there he made a record to be proud of, one of honor and distinction. And when he came back he was made the factotum of the Senate, the doer of all things. Wherever a good man was needed, wherever a wise man was needed, Leslie Biffle was put into the breech. For we know that this fellow Leslie Biffle never puts off anything until tomorrow. He always gives everything his best attention, he attends to every detail, to every little requirement, and the job he does is always the paragon of perfection. And then as JOHN McCLELLAN has told us, in 1933 Les became secretary to the majority in the Senate, and there ripened that friendship that made Leslie Biffle the intimate friend, the closest confidant and counsellor to the one and only, the immortal Mr. "Veep," our own beloved Alben Barkley. In those early days, Leslie Biffle contributed so much to the passage of legislation that took our Nation out of the depression of the thirties, that he was named a member of the American Battle Monuments Commission by the gallant leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt. And, may I say that he is honored tonight and we are all honored by the presence of one of his fellow members on the American Battle Monuments Commission, Mrs. Wendell Willkie.

In 1945 Les became the Secretary of the Senate and when our good friends the Republicans came into power with the 80th Congress of course they took the job; so Leslie came with the Democratic policy committee. I remember, as a member of that committee, we had a lot of discussion on some of the problems and we had to sit around the table trying to solve those problems, and finally some member would say, "Les, what do you think about it?" and then Les would seem to know everything. It was like turning the light on in a dark room and we gazed and the wonder grew how this little small head could carry all that Les knew. But, you see, Les not only thinks himself but he knows what everyone else thinks. Why, if he were in the Senate today, he would know exactly what BOB BARTLETT and ERNEST GRUENING were thinking. He made so many contributions to the work of the Senate and did so much for the Senate that we nominated him Mr. Biffle the Senator at Large from the United States. Our good friend, that great and fine American JOE MARTIN, referred to this poster up here; you see it. Well, you know for a long, long time we heard about the Arkansas traveler and we wondered who was the Arkansas traveler. In 1948, as you recall, all the experts, and all those who thought they were experts, declared that there was no question about it; the election was in the bag for the Republicans. Governor Dewey was certain to be the next President of the United States. Well, Leslie Biffle went back to Piggott, Ark. He went into the old trunk, got out the old blue denim overalls that he had down there on the farm, put on a pair of old brogan shoes, got him a tin lizzy and he went out across the country to visit the people, the farmer, the filling station operator, the corner grocery store operator, right down to the grassroots of American democracy, and then he began to send back the reports that the Democrats could win, that the Democrats would win, and I often wonder how much those words of encouragement and assurance from Leslie Biffle inspired that two-fisted fighting campaigner, give-'em-hell Harry. Our Republican friends know that Les is their friend; they also know his love for the Democratic Party, that he is the dedicated Democrat. It is as a friend above all else that tonight we pay our tribute to him. He is the friend that asks no questions, needs no assurances, makes no demands. All that he asks is to extend a helping hand, to do something for his friend and, as his friends we rejoice to pay our tribute to him. In Leslie Biffle and the example of his life we see the nobility of friendship, the strength of character, the fellowship of humility, the gospel of humanity, and the love of God. To know Leslie Biffle is to love him, to name him is to praise him.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, LISTER; thank you very much. I am indeed pleased to present to you another of my colleagues in the Senate, the former Governor of the great State of New Hampshire, now serving, I believe, his 22d year in the Senate. He was minority leader in the 82d Congress, the President pro tempore in the 83d Congress; he was also chairman of the Appropriations Committee during that Congress, and I may say to you that he is the ranking or the senior Republican in the United States Senate and the ablest statesman in the Republican Party. I present to you the Honorable STYLES BRIDGES.

Senator STYLES BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, Les, Mrs. Biffle and friends of Les Biffle. Probably few men in America have more genuine friends over the length and breadth of this country than Les Biffle. He is known for many of his accomplishments. One of those accomplishments referred to here this evening was the time in 1948 he went out as a pollster. He, at that time, attained a reputation as being a sort of "barnyard Gallup." He conducted a barnyard Gallup poll. It has been recalled here how he dressed up in old clothes, took a Ford pickup truck and started out to learn the political sentiment in this country. You know what happened and how he told the then President Truman that the pollsters had underestimated his strength. Les urged the President to hustle during the last few weeks of the campaign. This advice was followed, unfortunately, and the result was that on election day the Republicans were singing that song, "Hang down your head, Tom Dewey." There is one thing that most of you don't know, however, and that is that we Republicans were on the job at that time. We sent a man out to follow up Les Biffle. The only thing different was that we had him buying turkeys instead of chickens and we found that there were more chickens in this country than turkeys, much to our disappointment. Now, Les didn't make a poll in 1954 or 1956. He rested on his laurels but this last year he made a poll and he predicted that the Democrats would gain 14 seats in the Senate and 25 in the House. The rest is a sad story and I won't go into it. It reminds me of the anecdote about our President from the little State of New Hampshire, Franklin Pierce, who, incidentally, was a Democrat. We also at that period produced another great citizen who was the publisher of the New York Tribune—Horace Greeley. They didn't care for each other. After Franklin Pierce had been elected President—and this is a true story—Greeley sent one of his reporters back to the little town of Hillsboro, N. H., to make inquiry as to what kind of a President the local people thought Franklin Pierce would make. He finally went to a storekeeper by the name of Smith and said to Smith, "What kind of a President do you think Franklin Pierce will make?" The storekeeper in his typical Yankee tone said, "Well, I'll tell you. He has done pretty well here in the State in all the State offices he has held, but when you spread him over the whole country he will wear kind of thin in places." That was our only trouble last fall. We were a little thin in places. Now, when Les was Secretary of the Senate and when he was secretary of the majority here, he was known to us on the Republican side as a sort of "walking encyclopedia" and he lived up to that because he was the author of more proposals than I can describe on various bills which were sponsored by other people. He was uncanny in his ability to predict how the votes were going to come out and how each Senator was going to vote. As a matter of fact on several occasions I saw polls prepared by Biffle in which he predicted how I would vote before I had decided myself. It was a great source of wonder to me and admiration too to see Les Biffle move around the Senate floor and whisper to the various Senators. He is the only man I know who can whisper to you and not move his lips. I have always thought he would make a great, great ventriloquist. The only thing that bothered me was what Democratic Senator would he use as the dummy. Seriously speaking, there are a great many things about Les Biffle in which he and his family and all his friends can take great pride. He has done well for a country boy from Arkansas. He has attained a pinnacle in the Nation's Capital that few men reach. And I don't believe there is anyone in this room who would deny that there is no one individual on the American political scene today who has made more friends, real friends, in both political parties than Les Biffle. And as long as the American political scene continues to attract men of Les Biffle's character we don't have too many worries about the future of our Nation. He has my affection, my respect, and my esteem. You know, in closing, that I have not always agreed with the former President of the United States, Harry Truman, but he said at one time, and I quote, "They don't make them any better than Les Biffle." As we say on the floor of the U.S. Senate, I wish to associate myself with those remarks.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have a pleasant surprise for you. We are very happy that the distinguished majority leader of the Senate has been able to break away from the White House long enough to join us. LYNDON, you have the mike—they are waiting for you.

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Biffle, my fellow Americans. Somebody once said that there are two ways for every boy in Arkansas to go. He can either go up in the world or he can go to Texas. A loss to Texas can be a gain to the Nation. Les Biffle is one Arkansas boy who went up in the world but none of us are here tonight to honor him for that alone. For Les Biffle did more than to go up in the world for himself. The important thing is that he helped a great many others go up in the world themselves and once there he helped all of them serve the Nation better. When Les Biffle left his native Arkansas and came to Washington he brought with him far more than what he packed in that little suitcase. He brought good sense, warmth, and human understanding, and a lot of real backbone. As long as he was here his supply never ran low. He made men stronger, he made the Senate stronger, he made his party stronger, and he made a great contribution to strengthening his Nation by his counsel and his leadership. This is a great thing for any man to have said of himself. I hope, Les, that you will admit it to yourself. We honor you tonight as a man because you deserve it. In a larger sense, though, we honor you for the standard of selfless service which you have set because this Nation deserves such a standard of service. You, as all your friends know, spent your time here seeding your party with responsibility. I know it must be a great satisfaction to you and your gracious lady to see the harvest now being reaped by your party in these fields of responsibility. If I were writing you a postcard instead of speaking as I am I think you would appreciate the new meaning of an old message if I would say only, "Having a wonderful time, wish you were here with us."

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, LYNDON, we are so happy that you could get away from the White House dinner in time to join us and your remarks, I think, are a very fitting close and climax to the speeches we have had here this evening. My part on this program is coming to a close. Before I turn the gavel over to the cochairman, however, I should like to recognize and have her stand and take a bow—the estimable and charming lady, Mrs. Alben W. Barkley. Mrs. Barkley.

Now may I say, and I know everyone of you will join me in these sentiments, I want to say to Mrs. Biffle that every tribute paid here this evening to your illustrious husband and every sentiment we have expressed for him, you share in our thoughts equally. You have been to him a wonderful companion. You have made it possible for him to achieve his great success and to be endeared to all of us as we have expressed here tonight. I now turn the gavel back to your distinguished cochairman, J. Howard McGrath.

J. HOWARD MCGRATH. I assure you that I have made every effort to have my cochairman, Sam Pryor, take this place but he has declined. Leslie, you know that we would not have a testimonial in your honor unless we brought gifts so we have them and, briefly, I will present them to you and to Glade without remarks. First of all, let's open this up because these are very valuable gifts. On behalf of each and all who are gathered here, Les, we give you your 100th watch. And to you, Glade, we give you your 1,000th diamond. But above and, oh, yes, there is a little throw in here, Les, this is a book. You are from Arkansas, you know what a book is. It is something with a proud name on the back and a cover on each side but inside this book will be the most precious names you will ever know, at least for the next 50 years. So, once in a while when you are not at a Cafritz party or a Mesta party look through this book, read these names and remember us. Now, for all who are here and who are not here who have contributed to this dinner, I just want to announce that when the Biffles go home tonight, in their apartment there will be set up the finest yet produced color television set. This is a delicate instrument and it was thought unwise to display it here but this is the picture for all to see. As a matter of fact it is so delicate that Pryor and myself decided that we had better insure it for a year, so Les, if anything goes wrong with this machine for the next year, it is on us. After that you are on your own. These are our gifts. Don't you want to thank us for them?

LESLIE L. BIFFLE. My wonderful, wonderful friends. I am deeply, deeply touched at what you have done tonight. What an anticlimax this is going to be in the way of a speech. I am going to suggest to you something that you know already. I am as nervous as a June bride—it's true, too. I did pencil a few lines this morning. Thought I would be able to read them, but you turned out the lights on me. My good friends, I am deeply indebted to you all for this party, including the presents. I don't know how to thank you. So many have put in hours and hours—working day and night. I am very grateful. It says here, I am the happiest man in the world. I have already said the next paragraph. My 50 years in Washington. It's a long, long time in anybody's life. I arrived in the Capital City the last of November 1908. I was one of the greenest young fellows that ever arrived in the Capital; however, I know a certain fellow who was a little green when he came to Washington. I am calling no names but many of you know him. He got a job in the Senate in 1935, he studied and worked hard for 10 years, and then he was given another place. Shortly after that he was given still another place, which he held until January 1953. I think he has a job in a library out in the Middle West some place. May I tell you folks how I happened to come to Washington? In the month of May 1908, Congressman Macon came to my home town, Piggott. He was running for reelection. I went with my father down to the train to meet him. He walked up the street and the Congressman asked my father's permission for me to take him around and introduce him to the different people in our community. Well, I took him to the courthouse, to the different stores around the square, to the cotton gin, and to the sawmill. About 3 weeks after that my father had a letter from the Congressman saying he would like to appoint me his secretary. My father accepted before he could change his mind. He was so happy about it. I borrowed some money, I think it was $60. I went to a school in Little Rock to study shorthand. I think they called it "cross-electric." I never heard of it since. In the fall my father took me to St. Louis, bought for me a new suit, cost $11, and a new hat, cost $2. He put me on the train, day coach to Cincinnati, in an upper in a sleeper from Cincinnati to Washington. Our train had to wait about 3 hours for connections from Cincinnati to Louisville. I asked the conductor if it would be all right for me to walk down the street a little piece. It was just getting dark, the street lights were on. He said, "Yes, but don't go too far." While I was out walking it started to rain. My suit got wet; my hat got wet. The next morning when I got up I had a lot of trouble getting my trousers on—(it was an upper berth) you ought to try getting your clothes on in an upper berth in the mountains—when the train is throwing you from one side to the other. I may tell you I had a little trouble getting into that upper berth. I didn't know anything about a ladder. Had never seen a pullman before. The colored man wasn't in the car at the time, so I put my foot on the arm of the lower berth and tried to get up. Couldn't make it. A fellow sitting across the aisle from me said, "Buddy, if you will wait awhile the porter will bring you a ladder," which he did and I finally made it. I must say that the Congressman was certainly nice to me. He would dictate the mail to me in the morning, would go over to the House, and come back in the afternoon to sign it. It would take him about 3 hours to correct my letters and I would have to stay until about 11 or 12 at night rewriting them. It is a wonder he didn't send me home after the first month. I remained with the Congressman until he left public life and I then went over to the Senate side where I held various positions. Finally, I became Secretary of the Senate. Let me tell you of one of the most interesting experiences I ever had. It was in January 1947. The question before the Senate was the seating of Senator Bilbo. We at that time did not have a Vice President, President Truman having gone to the White House. The man who was to be President pro tempore was a Senator-elect. His name was way down on the list to be sworn in. I had to preside, being Secretary of the Senate at that time. The galleries were crowded, the floor packed and jammed. The debate started on Bilbo. I was not permitted to call a Senator to come and relieve me when I wanted to go to lunch or do anything else, all day long, all day long. It was a long, long afternoon. If you folks could see some of the notes that I have on file that different Senators would write and send up to me. "Les, would you like me to go out and eat a little lunch for you or would you like me to do this or that?" I must say this about my dear sweet wife, Glade. She has been a tower of strength to me. She has been a little peeved at me since Christmas. I gave her a Hagerstown Almanac. There is also something about Glade. Many of you know I am cross and irritable and hard to get along with. I sometimes go home cross and say something critical to her. She doesn't say a word back. She just shuts up like a clam. If she would fight back a little I think I would feel better, but she goes right along washing dishes or sweeping the carpet or something. She has been, as I said, a tower of strength to me. I had the most efficient help when I was Secretary of the Senate—Mrs. Darling, Mrs. Kraus, Mrs. Roche, and Mrs. Tucker. They were all very able girls and they were all loyal to the cause. Guess that's a blank piece of paper. Again, I must tell you how very grateful I am to you for the wonderful things that have been said about me tonight. You have touched me beyond expression. You have made me very happy and you have made my family very happy. My two sisters are sitting here. They came up from Miami for this occasion. Thank you ever, ever so much.

J. HOWARD MCGRATH. Now the first part of our program is over. We have a beautiful entertainment program. I hope that all of you can stay to listen to it. I turn you over now to the director of music.

J. HOWARD MCGRATH. I think now we have had quite a wonderful evening. The program has run a little longer than planned, but on behalf of Leslie and Glade and all of us who have had the privilege of being on this wonderful committee, I want to thank you a thousand percent. A thousand percent is the interest that we hope to make next year on the prosperity of America.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, from all the draining duties in the valley of toil we would turn to this shrine of our spirits, here to be made aware of eternal verities and lifted out of our littleness by abiding values greater than ourselves—causes to which we would be dedicated anew with singleness of purpose.

In this dismaying era, with all its dense darkness, we are deeply grateful for the things that cannot be shaken and for guiding beacons that no winds of violence can ever blow out, for the perpetual light of truth and goodness, beauty, integrity, and love fed by Thee, the eternal God of our salvation.

In the vast difficulties fronting the makers of a just peace in this generation, restore and strengthen and sustain our souls and lead us into paths of righteousness; for Thy name's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 28, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

SUPPORT PRICES FOR AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 59)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Congress of the United States:

There are produced, in the United States, some 250 farm commodities. The law has required that prices of 12 of these be supported at prescribed minimum levels. It is this requirement, together with the level of required support, that has created our farm surplus problems. Farmers who produce cattle, hogs, poultry, fruits, vegetables, and various other products the prices of which are not supported—as well as those who produce crops the prices of which are supported at discretionary levels—have generally experienced growing markets rather than a build-up of stocks in warehouses.

Three of the twelve mandatory products (wheat, corn, and cotton) account for about 85 percent of the Federal inventory of price-supported commodities though they produce only 20 percent of the total cash farm income.

The price-support and production-control program has not worked.

1. Most of the dollars are spent on the production of a relatively few large producers.

Nearly a million and a half farms produce wheat. Ninety percent of the expenditures for price support on wheat result from production of about half of these farms—the largest ones.

Nearly a million farms produce cotton. Seventy-five percent of the expenditures for cotton price support result from production of about one-fourth of these farms—the largest ones.

For other supported crops, a similarly disproportionate share of the expenditure goes to the large producers.

For wheat, cotton, and rice producers who have allotments of 100 acres or more, the net budgetary expenditures per farm for the present fiscal year are approximately as follows: Wheat, $7,000 per farm; cotton, $10,000 per farm; rice, $10,000 per farm.

Though some presently unknown share of these expenditures will eventually be recovered through surplus disposal, the final cost of the operation will undoubtedly be impressively large.

Clearly, the existing price support program channels most of the dollars to those who store the surpluses and to relatively few producers of a few crops. It does little to help the farmers in greatest difficulty. For small operators the rural development program approach, which helps develop additional sources of income, has clearly demonstrated that it is a far better alternative.

2. The control program does not control.

Mandatory supports are at a level which so stimulates new technology and the flow of capital into production as to offset, in large part, the control effort.

Despite acreage allotments and marketing quotas, despite a large soil bank program and despite massive surplus disposal, Government investment in farm commodities will soon be at a new record high. On July 1, 1959, total Government investment in farm commodities will total $9.1 billion. Investment in commodities for which price support is mandatory will total $7.6 billion, of which $7.5 billion will consist of those crops designated by law as basic commodities: wheat, corn, cotton, rice, peanuts, and tobacco. And these stocks are increasing rather than diminishing.

We already hold such huge stocks of wheat that if not 1 bushel of the oncoming crop were harvested we would still have more than enough for domestic use, export sales, foreign donation and needed carryover for an entire year.

3. The program is excessively expensive.

When the 1958 crops have come into Government ownership, the cost, in terms of storage, interest and other charges, of managing our inventory of supported crops, for which commercial markets do not exist at the support levels, will be running at a staggering rate, in excess of a billion dollars a year. Unless fundamental changes are made, this annual cost will rise.

This sum is approximately equal to the record amount being spent in fiscal 1960 by the Federal Government on all water resource projects in the United States including power, flood control, reclamation and improvement of rivers and harbors.

During the present fiscal year, the net budgetary outlay for programs for the stabilization of farm prices and farm income will be $5.4 billion. Four and three-tenths billion dollars of this is for commodities for which price supports are mandatory. While some unpredictable part of this outlay will be recovered in later years through sales for dollars, sales for foreign currency and through barter, the cost will be great, especially when compared with the net income of all farm operators in the United States, which in 1958 was $13 billion. Budgetary expenditures primarily for the support of farm prices and farm income are now equal to about 40 percent of net farm income.

Not a bushel of wheat nor a pound of cotton presently is exported without direct cost to the Federal Treasury.

Heavy costs might be justifiable if they were temporary, if they were solving the problems of our farmers, and if they were leading to a better balance of supplies and markets. But unfortunately this is not true.

These difficulties are not to be attributed to any failure on the part of our farm people, who have done an outstanding job of producing efficiently. They have in fact responded to the price incentive as farm people—and other people—traditionally have.

Our farm families deserve programs that build markets. Instead they have programs that lose markets. This is because the overall standards for the programs that they have are outdated relationships that existed nearly half a century ago. This was before 60 percent of our present population was born.

At that time it took 106 man-hours to grow and harvest 100 bushels of wheat. In recent years it has taken not 106 but 22. Since then the yield of wheat has doubled. Similar dramatic changes have occurred for other crops.

It is small wonder that a program developed many years ago to meet the problems of depression and war is ill-adapted to a time of prosperity, peace, and revolutionary changes in production.

The need to reduce the incentives for excess production has been explicit in the three special messages on agriculture which I have previously sent to the Congress. The point has repeatedly been made by the Secretary of Agriculture in his testimony and in his statements to the Congress. The Congress has moved in the right direction but by an insufficient amount. There has been a general tendency to underestimate the pace at which farm technology has been moving forward. Hence there has been a tendency to underestimate the production-inducing effect of the prescribed minimum price support levels.

RECOMMENDATION

I recommend that prices for those commodities subject to mandatory supports be related to a percentage of the average market price during the immediately preceding years. The appropriate percentage of the average market price should be discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture at a level not less than 75 and not more than 90 percent of such average in accordance with the general guidelines set forth in the law. Growers of corn, our most valuable crop, have already chosen, by referendum vote, program changes which include supports based on such an average of market prices.

If, despite the onrush of science in agriculture, resulting in dramatic increases in yields per acre, the Congress still prefers to relate price supports to existing standards, the Secretary should be given discretion to establish the level in accordance with the guidelines now fixed by law for all commodities except those for which supports presently are mandatory.

Either of these changes would be constructive. The effect of either would be to reconcile the farm program with the facts of modern agriculture, to reduce the incentive for unrealistic production, to move in the direction of easing production controls, to permit the growth of commercial markets and to cut the cost of Federal programs.

As we move to realistic farm programs, we must continue our vigorous efforts further to expand markets and find additional outlets for our farm products, both at home and abroad. In these efforts, there is an immediate and direct bearing on the cause of world peace. Food can be a powerful instrument for all the free world in building a durable peace. We and other surplus-producing nations must do our very best to make the fullest constructive use of our abundance of agricultural products to this end. These past 4 years our special export programs have provided friendly food-deficit nations with $4 billion worth of farm products that we have in abundance. I am setting steps in motion to explore anew with other surplus-producing nations all practical means of utilizing the various agricultural surpluses of each in the interest of reinforcing peace and the well-being of friendly peoples throughout the world—in short, using food for peace.

Certain details regarding the needed changes in law, particularly with reference to wheat, are appended to this message in the form of a memorandum to me from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Difficulties of the present program should not drive us to programs which would involve us in even greater trouble. I refer to direct payment programs, which could soon make virtually all farm people dependent, for a large share of their income, upon annual appropriations from the Federal Treasury. I refer also to various multiple-price programs, which would tax the American consumer so as to permit sale for feed and export at lower prices.

To assist the Congress in discharging its responsibility, the administration stands ready, as always, to provide the appropriate committees with studies, factual data and judgments. Continuation of the price support and production control programs in their present form would be intolerable.

I urge the Congress to deal promptly with this problem.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1959.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills, the submission of petitions and memorials, and the transaction of other routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

A resolution adopted by the Board of Directors of the Hot Springs, S. Dak., Chamber of Commerce, relating to the closing of the low-power booster station necessary for television reception in the city of Hot Springs; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

RESOLUTION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] I present for appropriate reference, and ask to have printed in the RECORD a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to incorporate the principle of reinsurance as a means of enabling the Federal Government to assume its proper responsibilities in equalizing the burden of financing the employment security program. The language of the resolution is comprehensive and speaks for itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, under the rule, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES TO ENACT LEGISLATION TO INCORPORATE THE PRINCIPLE OF REINSURANCE AS A MEANS OF ENABLING THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ASSUME ITS PROPER RESPONSIBILITY IN EQUALIZING THE BURDEN OF FINANCING THE EMPLOYMENT SECURITY PROGRAM

Whereas experience has shown that certain highly industrialized areas of the country are the first to suffer the results of unemployment due to recessions in the economy; and

Whereas Rhode Island has few natural resources and is dependent on manufacturing industries; and

Whereas the economy of such industrialized areas depends upon a demand for its manufactured products which is far beyond a single State's border to contain and control; and

Whereas these and most causes of unemployment are national in scope; and

Whereas the effects of unemployment fall unevenly upon the highly industrialized States, of which Rhode Island is one; and

Whereas this results in a severe drain on the Rhode Island employment security fund, placing this State in an unfavorable competitive position with other States not so severely affected: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island hereby urges the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which would incorporate the principle of reinsurance as a means of enabling the Federal Government to assume its proper responsibility in financing in part the employment security program and thereby equalizing the tax burden among the States; and be it further

Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of state to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States, earnestly requesting that each use his best efforts to enact legislation which would carry out the purposes of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

RESOLUTION URGING WITHDRAWAL OF RECOGNITION OF U.N. REPRESENTATIVES OF CURRENT HUNGARIAN REGIME

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today I have received from Mr. James Ircink, president, and Mr. Harold W. Grenell, chairman of the legislative committee, a resolution passed by the Archbishop Albert G. Meyer, deanery council No. 2 of the Milwaukee Archdiocesan Council of Catholic Men. The resolution is in relation to the withdrawal of recognition of United Nations representatives of the current Hungarian regime. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION REGARDING WITHDRAWAL OF RECOGNITION OF U.N. REPRESENTATIVES OF CURRENT HUNGARIAN REGIME

The imminent discussion of the Hungarian problem by the U.N. General Assembly prompts the executive committee of the National Council of Catholic Men, on behalf of the 9 million members of its affiliated organizations, to approve unanimously the following policy resolution:

In view of the fact: (1) That the present government of Hungary has been imposed on the Hungarian people by the military forces of the U.S.S.R.;

(2) That the U.N. General Assembly by resolution has declared Hungary to have been deprived of its liberty and political independence, and the people of their human rights, through the armed intervention of the U.S.S.R.;

(3) That true freedom of religion is nonexistent, and in its place the Hungarian puppet government has adopted a policy of terroristic suppression and persecution symbolized by the primate of Hungary, His Eminence Josef Cardinal Mindszenty who, were it not for the refuge that has been accorded him by the U.S. Government, would have been imprisoned or executed;

(4) That further indecision on the part of the General Assembly in the face of the defiance by Hungary and the U.S.S.R. of its many previous resolutions calling for the withdrawal of Soviet troops and the cessation of persecution of the Hungarian people will cause world opinion to turn against the U.N.—

The National Council of Catholic Men importunes the General Assembly to immediately and overwhelmingly vote to reject the credentials of the representatives of the present Hungarian Government.

COMPREHENSIVE STUDY OF PROBLEMS OF THE AGED—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 65) authorizing a comprehensive study of problems of the aged, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to the problems of the aging including, but not limited to, (a) a study of the major problems of the aged, (b) a study of the existing programs of agencies, both public and private, dealing with problems of the aged, (c) a study of the present role of the Federal Government in dealing with problems of the aged, and (d) a study of any additional Federal programs which should be undertaken to help solve the problems of the aged.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $85,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

STUDY OF NATIONAL LABOR AND LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACTS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 66) authorizing a study of the National Labor and Labor-Management Relations Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to make a full and complete study of the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947 with a view to ascertaining the extent to which changes in such acts are desirable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from the date on which this resolution is agreed to to July 1, 1959, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ, upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than June 1, 1959.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $20,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. NEUBERGER, and Mr. MORSE):

S. 760. A bill to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, so as to provide that an injured employee shall have the right to select his own physician, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina (by request):

USE OF AMERICAN FOOD AS PART OF FOREIGN ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference on behalf of myself, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], a concurrent resolution which should be basic to any farm legislation passed by this body in this session.

It is fitting that today, when the Congress has once again been presented with a Presidential message which forebodes only despair for the producers of agricultural abundance, we should place the American farmer in his true perspective.

In every other country in the world, a flowing abundance of food and fiber would be considered the great treasure that it truly is. And in our hearts we here do so consider it. Therefore, in order to reach our goal of the maximum good to be derived from the use of this wealth, we need to state clearly some guidelines. This concurrent resolution embodies such guidelines and states that the intent of Congress is to resolve the paradox of American agricultural surpluses existing in a hungry world. A similar resolution is being introduced concurrently in the House of Representatives by the Representative from South Dakota [Mr. MCGOVERN].

It is our hope that by following these guidelines, we will develop legislation in this session that will implement this intent of Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the concurrent resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE in the chair). The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, under the rule, will be printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 8) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the abundance of food and fiber produced by the American farmer is the marvel of the world; and

Whereas most of the people of the world are undernourished; and

Whereas the American people historically have been concerned with the well-being of other peoples; and

Whereas in many Nations of the free world vital economic development programs are retarded and political stability is threatened by an inadequate supply of food; and

Whereas the remarkable bounty of the free American farmer has resulted in accumulations of farm commodities for which there is insufficient domestic demand; and

Whereas the Congress seeks to reduce unnecessary expenditures, including, where possible, those for commodity storage and for foreign assistance; and

Whereas the Soviet bloc has publicly challenged the United States and her allies to economic competition in demonstrating before the world the viability of their respective economic systems: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that an agricultural abundance is one of America's greatest assets for raising living standards and promoting peace and stability in the free world; and that Congress favors action to resolve the paradox of American agricultural surpluses and world food needs by more fully utilizing the resources of the American farmer as an integral part of the United States' foreign assistance program.

SEC. 2. This concurrent resolution may be cited as the "Food for Peace Resolution."

RESOLUTIONS

The following resolutions were reported or submitted and referred as indicated:

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 65), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 66), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

STUDY TO DETERMINE WHETHER CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM MAY BE FURTHERED BY ASSISTANCE FROM RESERVE COMPONENTS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. CURTIS (for himself and Mr. HRUSKA) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 67), which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services:

Whereas a nuclear attack upon the United States would place upon the existing civil defense organization responsibilities far in excess of the capabilities of their present manpower and resources;

Whereas there is a need for a large reservoir of trained and disciplined personnel to provide for the needs of the civilian population in the event of such an emergency;

Whereas such a reservoir is available in the form of the reserve components of our Armed Forces, among the members of which are persons, many of whom are experienced in conditions of actual warfare, trained in transportation, communication, food supply, first aid, and other essential skills; and

Whereas the Reserve Officers Association of the United States, at its 32d annual convention on June 27, 1958, adopted a resolution urging that a study be made of ways and means of employing, under such conditions as may be found feasible, the skills and experience of active, standby, and retired members of the reserve components of the Armed Forces in formulating a practical plan for civil defense: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Armed Services, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed under section 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to make a full and complete study with a view to developing a plan for organizing and utilizing the manpower and resources of the various reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States in carrying out the civil defense program in the event of an armed attack.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

THE BYRD ANTARCTIC COMMISSION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish an Antarctic Commission. In proposing this legislation, I am happy to include as cosponsors the following Senators: Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. ENGLE, and Mr. YARBOROUGH.

The proposed Commission would be named the "Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission," in honor of the great explorer whose name symbolizes man's search into the unknown, man's courage in the face of the elements, man's devotion to duty.

The Commission itself would be composed of a Director, two Deputy Directors, and an 11-member board of governors—all to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The proposed legislation would establish a Commission for the following major purposes:

First. To collect, consolidate, and better utilize the available data on the South Polar region;

Second. Reevaluate this data in the light of current needs, and, so far as possible, make recommendations for clearer, more effective policies;

Third. Conduct field and laboratory studies to further knowledge of science, commerce,and related activities;

Fourth. Be prepared to conduct research, investigation, and experimentation in Antarctic matters relating to the national defense or other interests of the United States;

Fifth. Assist, and, as necessary, direct plans by other U.S. agencies for operations or expeditions into the Antarctic, for military, scientific, or other purposes;

Sixth. Establish a depository of information relating to the Antarctic.

There is a generally recognized need for better protecting U.S. interests, and establishing and maintaining rights in Antarctica. Unfortunately, until now, this has been a scattered and sporadic effort—a kind of off-again, on-again policy. Approximately 14 different Government agencies have participated in or have expressed interest in the region. However, there has been practically no coordination of these scattered interests. As a result, we have had—at best—a hazy policy.

The aim of the proposed legislation is to promote a more effective policy and to better protect U.S. interests in the Antarctic.

To accommodate additional Senators who may wish to join as sponsors of this bill, I request unanimous consent that it be privileged to lie on the table until the end of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILEY. In addition, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill itself and an accompanying statement on the background of Antarctica printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 764) to provide for continuity and support of study, research and development of programs for peaceful uses in science, commerce, and other activities related to Antarctica, which shall include, but shall not be limited to gathering, evaluating, correlating, and dispersing of information and knowledge obtained from exploration, research, and other media relating to weather, communications, travel, and other areas of information; also to coordinate Antarctic activities among those agencies of the U.S. Government and private institutions interested in or concerned directly with the promotion, advancement, increase, and diffusion of knowledge of the Antarctic; and to direct and administer U.S. Antarctic programs in the national interest, introduced by Mr. WILEY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission Act of 1959".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. When used in this Act:

(1) "Commission" means the Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission.

(2) "Director" means the Director of the Commission.

(3) "Board" means the Board of Governors.

(4) "Commissioned officer" means a commissioned officer of the Armed Forces of the United States.

THE COMMISSION

SEC. 3. There is established in the Executive Branch of the Government, the Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission. The Commission shall consist of a Director, two Deputy Directors, and a Board of Governors.

FUNCTIONS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4. The Commission shall—

(1) maintain a depository of information relating to the Antarctic including: (A) all records of the Commission, (B) originals or copies of records within the Executive Branch relating to the Antarctic, (C) books, pamphlets, periodicals, and articles dealing with the Antarctic, and (D) such other information as the Commission considers desirable;

(2) conduct such field and laboratory studies and evaluations as it considers advisable to further the knowledge of the Antarctic in science, commerce, and related activities, which shall include, but shall not be limited to gathering, evaluating, and dispersing of information and knowledge obtained from exploration, research, and other media, relating to weather, communications, travel, and other areas of information;

(3) publish or arrange for the publication of scientific, technical, historical, and general information so as to further the dissemination of information about the Antarctic, when the dissemination is consistent with the interests of national security and the public interest (publication may be made without regard to section 87 of the Act of January 12, 1895, ch. 23 (28 Stat. 622), and section 11 of the Act of March 1, 1919, ch. 86 (40 Stat. 1270; 44 U.S.C. 111));

(4) with the concurrence and approval of the Board, perform, at the request of the head of any executive agency, specific research, investigation, or experimentation in connection with matters relating to the national defense and/or the interests of the United States;

(5) approve the plans for and supervise Antarctic operations or expeditions conducted by, or supported by, other agencies of the United States except for operations or expeditions or parts thereof which are military in character;

(6) assist private Antarctic expeditions or research programs when such assistance is in the best interests of the United States;

(7) accept and utilize the services of voluntary and uncompensated personnel and provide transportation and subsistence as authorized by section 5 of the Act of August

2, 1946, chapter 744 (60 Stat. 808), as amended (5 U.S.C. 73b–2), for persons serving without compensation; and

(8) acquire by purchase, lease, loan, or gift, and hold or dispose of by sale, lease, or loan, real or personal property necessary for, or resulting from, the exercise of authority under this Act;

(9) receive and use funds donated to the Commission if such funds are donated without restriction other than that they be used to carry out the general purposes of this Act;

(10) report to the President before September 16 of each year, summarizing the activities of the Commission and making such recommendations as it considers appropriate. The report shall include the recommendation of the Board.

THE DIRECTOR OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 5. (a) The Director shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a period of 6 years and shall be paid at the rate prescribed in section 107(a) of the Federal Executive Pay Act, 1956 (70 Stat.). He may be a person appointed from civilian life or a commissioned officer in an active or retired status.

(b) The Director shall—

(1) manage the affairs of the Commission;

(2) issue such regulations as he considers necessary to carry out this act; and

(3) appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as may be necessary to carry out this act;

(4) be a member of the board of governors ex officio.

(c) The appointments made and the compensation fixed shall be in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949 and the regulations of the Civil Service Commission. However, the Director may employ such technical and professional personnel, and fix their compensation, as he considers necessary, without regard to the Classification Act of 1949 or the regulations of the Civil Service Commission. The Director may terminate the employment of any officers or employees, except the Deputy Directors, whenever he considers that termination to be in the best interests of the United States, except that no person in the classified service may be removed or suspended without pay unless it is accomplished under the act of August 24, 1912 (ch. 389, 37 Stat. 555), as amended (5 U.S.C. 652).

DEPUTY DIRECTORS

SEC. 6. (a) The Deputy Directors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall perform such duties as he may prescribe.

(b) The Deputy Directors may be appointed from civilian life or may be commissioned officers in an active or retired status. However, if the Director is appointed from civilian life, only one Deputy Director may be a commissioned officer. If the Director is a commissioned officer, both Deputy Directors shall be appointed from civilian life.

(c) The Deputy Directors shall be paid $———— a year.

MILITARY STATUS OF DIRECTOR AND DEPUTY DIRECTORS

SEC. 7. (a) When a commissioned officer is appointed as Director or Deputy Director, he is not subject to military authority and may not exercise command over any members of the Armed Forces of the United States except as the President may prescribe.

(b) The appointment of a commissioned officer as Director or Deputy Director does not affect his status or rank or the pay and allowances incident to his status or rank. He is entitled to receive the pay and allowances payable to an officer of his rank and length of service, for which the appropriate department shall be reimbursed from any funds available to defray the expenses of the Commission. He is also entitled to be paid by the Commission the amount by which the compensation provided for the Director or Deputy Director exceeds his annual military pay and allowances.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS

SEC. 8. (a) The Board—consisting of eleven members—shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Board shall consist of the President of the National Academy of Sciences; Director of the National Science Foundation; Secretary of Defense; Secretary of State; Secretary of Interior; Secretary of Commerce, or their designees, plus four selected from civil life who are eminently qualified in their professions so as to provide, in addition to Federal administration, a broad field of knowledge and experience which will properly relate the activities of the Commission to the National Welfare.

(b) The members of the Board, in addition to the president of the National Academy of Sciences; Director of the National Science Foundation; Secretary of Defense; Secretary of State; Secretary of Interior; Secretary of Commerce, or their designees, shall be appointed for a period of six years, except that (1) any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term of his predecessor shall be appointed for the remainder of the term; (2) the term of office of the members first taking office after the date of enactment of this Act shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, one at the end of two years, one at the end of four years, and two at the end of six years; and (3) a member may be reappointed to the Board for not more than one additional term; and (4) the members of the Board who are Cabinet members shall be members of that Board during the tenure of office as Cabinet members.

(c) Members of the Board shall be paid at the rate of $50 per day—for each day—except members of the President's Cabinet during their services as members of the Board, and shall be allowed travel expenses as authorized by section 5 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (ch. 744, 60 Stat. 808), as amended (5 U.S.C. 73b–2).

(d) The Board shall—

(1) meet annually on the first Monday in November and at such other times as the chairman determines;

(2) elect a chairman and vice chairman, at the regular annual meeting, to serve for the following year;

(3) review and assess the research and exploration activities relating to the Antarctic; and

(4) make such recommendations to the Commission as they consider appropriate for the advancement and dissemination of knowledge of the Antarctic.

RESEARCH CENTERS

SEC. 9. (a) Under the provisions of this Act there shall be established a minimum of five, and not more than eight research centers at academic and/or research institutions having special competences or interests in scientific aspects of polar research.

The Commission shall determine that each such center shall meet criteria prescribed by the Commission under the policy guidance provided by the Board of Governors, and the Commission shall be responsible for the overall development and coordination of programs of research which may be approved for development within the research centers in, and related to the Antarctic region. Such programs of research as may be initiated at the research centers with the approval of the Commission shall be supported by Federal or private funds.

(b) Due to the unique requirements of polar research, a designated number of fellowships shall be provided to permit qualified students to conduct studies at the research centers and also in Antarctica. The Commission shall be authorized to grant funds in support of fellowships specifically associated with polar research, recommended by the Director of the Commission and approved by the Board of Governors.

SERVICES AND FUNDS OF OTHER AGENCIES

SEC. 10. (a) The Commission may, with the consent of the agency concerned, accept and utilize on a reimbursable basis the officers, employees, services, facilities, and information of any agency of the United States. However, such services and facilities may be furnished only if it does not interfere with the performance of the primary mission of the agency concerned. An agency having custody of data relating to the matters within the jurisdiction of the Commission shall, upon request of the Director, make that data available to the Commission without reimbursement.

(b) Funds available to any agency of the United States for scientific or technical research, educational, or other public service are available for transfer, with the approval of the head of the agency concerned, to the Commission for such use as is consistent with the purposes for which those funds were provided. Funds so transferred shall be spent by the Commission for the purposes for which the transfer was made or for general administrative expenses until such time as an appropriation is made available to the Commission.

ACTS AMENDED

SEC. 11. Subsection 107(a) of the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956 is amended by adding the following after clause (22):

"(23) Director of the Antarctic Commission."

SEC. 12. Section 505 of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended (70 Stat. 762; 5 U.S.C. 1105), is amended by adding the following subsection:

"(f) The Director of the Antarctic Commission is authorized, without regard to any other provision of this section, to place a total of seven positions in the Antarctic Commission in grades 16, 17, and 18 of the General Schedule. Such positions shall be in addition to the number of positions authorized to be placed in such grades by subsection (b)."

The statement presented by Mr. WILEY is as follows:

STATEMENT ON BACKGROUND OF ANTARCTICA

U.S. interest in Antarctica dates to the early part of the 18th century. Capt. Nathaniel B. Palmer, of Stonington, Conn., sighted the continent near the tip of the Palmer Peninsula. The date was November 17, 1820. On February 7, 1821, Capt. John Davis, of New Haven, Conn., landed on the shore of Antarctica along what is now known as Hughes Bay. Davis wrote in his log book: "I think this southern land to be a continent." He was right, for an expedition led by Lt. Charles Wilkes of the U.S. Navy proved the point. This was the first time our Government sent its ships to explore Antarctica.

Sailing from the United States, late in 1838, Wilkes first reached the Antarctica, south of Cape Horn, early the following year. After sailing along the ice pack, westward, he went to Australia for the Antarctic winter.

He returned to the Antarctic, south of Australia, in December 1840. There he saw land at numerous points over a distance of 1,500 miles. People now knew there was a southern continent, and they called it Antarctica. Today, a considerable area of Antarctica is known as Wilkes Land.

Various nations, from time to time, made minor probings along the shores of Antarctica, and several made direct dashes to the South Pole. Among these were the Norwegian, Roald Amundsen, who was first to reach the South Pole, and about a month later, Capt. Robert Falcon Scott arrived at the southernmost extremity of the globe, only to discover that Amundsen had arrived first.

The first real assault upon Antarctica was made by the Byrd Expedition (1928–30) and it is best remembered by most Americans for the flight over the South Pole, on November 29, 1929. No doubt, more important were the discoveries of the Edsel Ford Range, the Rockefeller Mountains, and Marie Byrd Land—and the accomplishments, scientifically—for Admiral Byrd served more than 20 branches of science.

The Second Byrd Expedition (1933–35) concentrated on scientific work and used tractors more than any previous expedition. It was on this expedition that Admiral Byrd stayed alone at an advance weather station. There he kept careful records from March 28 through August 10, 1934. No man had ever wintered so far south before. Due to a faulty stove and exhaust fumes from a motor, Admiral Byrd almost lost his life before a party from Little America arrived.

Byrd led another expedition to Antarctica in 1939, known as the U.S. Antarctic Service, and in which our Government played a large part. Two bases were set up: One called West Base, at Little America III, and the other called East Base, on an island off the west coast of the Palmer Peninsula. Much scientific and geographic work was accomplished by ground parties and the use of aircraft for exploration and photography beyond the reach of the ground parties. The men returned to the United States early in 1941.

American interest in Antarctica was further extended in 1946–47, with the activities during the Antarctic summer, carried on with 13 ships and 4,000 men. It was called Operation High Jump. Much of value was accomplished. One outstanding event was the flight of six, two-engine transport planes from a Navy aircraft carrier to the Bay of Whales. Another was the success of icebreakers in freeing a path through the pack ice. Still a third was the use of aircraft tenders and seaplanes to photograph large areas of Antarctica never seen, previously. It is known that Operation High Jump, under the leadership of Admiral Byrd and Admiral Cruzens, discovered more of Antarctica than all previous expeditions combined.

During the Antarctic summer, a small U.S. expedition called Operation Windmill (1947–48) arrived in Antarctica. Helicopters were used extensively on this expedition for photographic purposes.

Before 1950, two other American expeditions visited Antarctica, one led by Lincoln Ellsworth and the other by Finn Ronne. Ellsworth, in 1935, made the first long-distance flight, in easy stages, from Dundee Island to within a few miles of Little America. He returned to Antarctica in 1938–39, during which time he made aerial surveys over the area now known as American Highland.

Finn Ronne, a veteran of two expeditions with Admiral Byrd, used the East Base on the west coast of Palmer Peninsula. Ronne greatly extended the work of Americans.

The problem of our physical environment is of fundamental, continuing interest. The things which make up this environment control much of our physical life, such as our food, clothing, housing, transportation, and communication, and the weather of the world around us, and in a large way, affect our total environment. It is essential that we know more about our physical world and environment and how such affects our lives—favorable or otherwise.

Scientists throughout the world joined to establish the International Geophysical Year. An important sector for study was Antarctica, and 12 nations joined in establishing bases or stations at the edge of Antarctica, and inland, even at the South Pole itself. The International Geophysical Year opened formally on July 1, 1957 and ended December 31, 1958. But the preparation for U.S. participation in the Antarctic began in November 1954, when the U.S. Navy sent the icebreaker ATKA to look for appropriate sites for scientific stations.

That was only the beginning, for under the operations leadership of Rear Adm. George J. Dufek, an Antarctic veteran of two previous expeditions, and with Rear Adm. Richard E. Byrd as officer in charge of the broad program, six stations were established on Antarctica and the air facility base at McMurdo Sound was established.

Our scientific interests were handled by the National Academy of Sciences. This organization set up the framework of scientific plans to carry out our part in the International Geophysical Year, a special committee for this purpose with a subcommittee on the Antarctic. The subcommittee was headed by Dr. Laurence Gould, with Admiral Byrd as honorary chairman.

The Navy was given the task of getting the scientists to the Antarctic, building their stations, and seeing that they were fed and supported.

The Navy designated the project Operation Deep Freeze. Admiral Dufek was able to secure the assistance of the Army, Air Force, Marines, and the Coast Guard to help accomplish the vast project of locating, building, and establishing the bases for the use of our IGY scientists.

On Operation Deep Freeze I (1955–56) the Navy built two stations on the shore of the Ross Sea—one at McMurdo Sound, the other near Admiral Byrd's earlier Little Americas.

In addition to establishing the bases, the Navy flew four Navy aircraft from New Zealand to McMurdo Sound. These notable flights marked the first to fly from another land mass to Antarctica. While the planes were in Antarctica that season, they flew over 1,800,000 square miles, of which approximately a million square miles had never been seen before. One of the notable flights was from McMurdo Sound across the Antarctic Continent to the Weddell Sea and return, nonstop.

When the airplanes and ships left the Antarctic early in 1956, Americans had seen about 4 million of the 5½ million square miles of Antarctica. At the termination of Deep Freeze I 73 men remained at Little America and 93 at McMurdo Sound. In addition, supplies and equipment were left with which to construct two more stations, one in Marie Byrd Land and the other at the South Pole.

Deep Freeze II, the following season (1956–57) saw great accomplishments. The Byrd Station was constructed after great hardship and by efficiency of the men who set out to build this base. This project took the combined effort of the three services, big tractors, aircraft, and a great amount of patience in covering approximately 600 miles over rough ice and at points, giant crevasses which had to be bridged in order that the tractor supply trains could pass.

On October 31, 1956, Rear Admiral Dufek and a Navy crew flew to and landed at the South Pole. This was the third group in history to stand at the pole; Amundsen, in 1911, and Scott, in 1912. But the admiral's mission was not the matter of a first, but to determine the feasibility of establishing a South Pole scientific station.

Before the work was completed at the South Pole station, the Air Force had dropped more than 700 tons of material, equipment, and supplies. Those who were to spend the long winter night at the pole—scientists and military—were flown in by Navy aircraft. That winter the temperature went down to a minus 102° below zero.

During Deep Freeze II, three other stations were built by the Navy—one at Cape Hallett, occupied by American and New Zealand staffs; another at the Knox Coast, named "Wilkes" for the naval explorer; and the third across the continent at the ice shelf of the Weddell Sea, called Ellsworth.

Deep Freeze III (1957–58) and Deep Freeze IV (1958–59) were largely, operations of resupply and logistical support.

The U.S. scientists have carried on what is believed to be the most effective scientific exploratory work and coordination of scientific interest ever attempted in Antarctica. In addition to the scientific disciplines studied and compiled, the United States has participated in exploring between 15,000 and 20,000 miles of Antarctica as a part in the IGY programs. In these scientific treks the American, and eight other nations have found mountain ranges and explored extensive areas in unexplored regions. The resulting discoveries included new mountains and knowledge that there is about 40 percent more ice in Antarctica than was previously estimated. Other scientific work was accomplished on the trails.

During the period from July 1, 1957 to December 31, 1958, the scientists working in the South Polar region have studied cosmic rays, geomagnetism, meteorology, ionospheric observations, gravity, seismology, glaciology, aurora, and airglow. The data from these observations are being collected and it is hoped that the results will be made available to extend and broaden knowledge of our physical world.

It is readily understood that Antarctica presents special problems, because of its severe climate and its remoteness, which has made the vast, mysterious and ice-locked continent relatively inaccessible. As a result, this forbidding area of the world required exploratory expeditions in advance, before selected locations for the construction of the scientific stations could be fully determined.

The scientists were prepared to carry out the necessary plans of scientific study programed for the International Geophysical Year. They required substantial logistical support in order to operate their laboratories in remote areas of Antarctica.

This logistic support was provided by the Department of Defense in one of the greatest achievements in the history of polar exploration, under the able leadership of Admiral Dufek, commanding officer of Task Force 43.

Plans are now being made to continue U.S. scientific programs in Antarctica, in the post-IGY at the Byrd, Pole, Hallett stations and McMurdo Air Facility, with some summer activity at Little America. The Ellsworth and Wilkes stations are to be operated by Argentina and Australia, respectively, with American scientists participating at the stations.

It is anticipated that the polar research programs will have long-range objectives, and it is also realized that the Federal Government will be looked to to continue to fund, not only the logistical support, but the cost of operating the programs of research. Such, places the Government in a key position where across-the-board coordination will continue to be necessary, not only among the many branches of the Government interested in various phases of Antarctic effort, but also to work with civilian planning and direction of polar research programs. The Government and civil interests should be in a position to draw upon the experience and judgment of scientists in and out of Government, and afford a means for both groups to conduct programs in particular fields of research. There should be full coordination among both groups in order to benefit, mutually, and in the general interest there should be an avoidance of duplication.

The planning, development, organization, and direction of various types of polar effort should include, not only the scientific research phases but also, various other aspects of competences, interests, and values as parts in the integration of programs and capabilities; thereby fostering and developing as broad a national base as possible, composed of Government, private institution, and academic competence, so that an organization will serve and represent the total U.S. interests in Antarctica.

The proposed legislation contemplates these essential factors, and proposes to bring together research, administrative, operational, logistical, academic, and general phases in a central organization for achieving the national and civil objectives. Each major U.S. interest would join in, and actively participate in the Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission as the device for achieving the aims and purposes indigenous to a free society. The varied and complicated problems involving the broad U.S. interests in Antarctica at the national level require implementation and organization which will consolidate the diverse interests both governmental and private, and provide all segments with a means for planning, policymaking, administration, operation, and management of the total interests and requirements for the best advantage of all concerned.

COOPERATION WITH STATES ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY PROBLEMS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], and the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] two bills relating to the control and prevention of juvenile delinquency. One of these measures would provide for assistance to and cooperation with States for the training of qualified personnel for work in various fields involving the prevention, treatment, and control of juvenile delinquency; the other would provide for assistance to States and institutions of higher learning for demonstrating or developing improved techniques and practices for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

In introducing proposed legislation on juvenile delinquency or in discussing the subject, it has been the custom to point with alarm at the rising tide of lawlessness among our youth. I am not going to do that here today because I feel that we all know the scope and dimensions of the problem. Further, we know the value of our youth and the necessity in these crucial times of seeing that each youngster has the opportunity to grow to responsible adulthood. We need responsible and productive citizens more than we have ever needed them, and we can produce such citizens only if we take steps now to curtail the blight of delinquency which has spread so rapidly across our land.

Testimony adduced at hearings of the Committee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency indicates that one of the most acute problems faced by local and State agencies dealing with juveniles is the lack of trained personnel. All too often courts are hampered because of a lack of trained probation and social workers to implement the work and decisions of the judge; institutions are much too frequently reduced to mere programs of containment; clinics and other social agencies are forced to spread their available talent so thin that their effectiveness is often dissipated; and many police departments have no specialized assistance in their crucial work with children. In community after community, we have found this same pattern and listened to the same pleas for adequate personnel in terms of both quantity and quality.

The bill for the demonstrating or developing of improved techniques and practices would provide for the appropriation of a small amount of "risk capital" to be used for grants to States and to public and private nonprofit institutions of higher learning or research for special projects which hold promise of making a substantial contribution to the strengthening or improving of programs for the diminution, control, or treatment of juvenile delinquency.

The role of the Federal Government in the fight against delinquency has, quite properly I believe, been a limited one. And the passage of these two bills would be in line with this tradition for these measures would help the States to handle their own problems. This is no device by which the Federal Government would take over the problems and affairs of the States; rather it would put at their disposal a certain amount of aid so that they might better find solutions to their own problems.

Mr. President, I commend these two bills to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills introduced by Mr. HENNINGS on behalf of himself and other Senators were severally received, read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. LANGER), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

S. 765. A bill to provide for assistance to States and institutions of higher learning for demonstrating or developing improved techniques and practices for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency; and

S. 766. A bill to provide for assistance to and cooperation with States and institutions of higher learning for the training of qualified personnel for work in various fields involving the prevention, treatment, and control of juvenile delinquency.

EXPANSION OF REHABILITATION SERVICES

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, Rehabilitation Act of 1959, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE]. The bill is to provide an expansion of rehabilitation services to the physically and mentally handicapped people of the United States. Our rehabilitation efforts are carried on through the State-Federal rehabilitation program, administered by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare on the Federal level and by State Boards for Vocational Education or State Rehabilitation agencies in the States. This program was established in 1920 and expanded by Public Law 113 of the 78th Congress and Public Law 565 of the 83d Congress. In 1958, these States agencies served 258,000 handicapped persons and completed rehabilitation for 74,000. The program shows steady and heartening progress in all of its aspects, but there remain certain gaps in available services. The principal provisions of the bill which were designed to fill those gaps are as follows:

INDEPENDENT LIVING

At the present time, to be accepted for rehabilitation services there must be a reasonable expectation that the handicapped individual will be employable following such rehabilitation services. This means that many handicapped individuals who could profit substantially from rehabilitation services must be denied benefits, because their objectives must be less than employment. It means, likewise, that many severely handicapped persons who might become employable are denied services because of the reluctance of responsible professional persons to predict their employability. This situation results in a tragic waste of human resources, since large numbers of these handicapped people would actually become employable, if they were given the opportunity to begin their rehabilitation programs.

In this bill, we would establish a program of rehabilitation for those whose objectives must be, at least in the beginning, less than employment. Services for such individuals are called independent living rehabilitation services, because their objective is to make the handicapped person as independent of others as it is possible for him to be. Specifically, two additional classes of handicapped people are eligible for services under this title: Institutionalized persons who as a result of rehabilitation services can achieve such ability of independent living as to dispense with the need for expensive institutional care, and homebound disabled persons who can achieve such ability of independent living as to be able to dispense with an attendant at home.

This program is to be administered by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and by the State rehabilitation agencies that now administer the State-Federal vocational rehabilitation program. The addition of applicants for independent living rehabilitation services to those now provided vocational rehabilitation services is a natural and logical extension of the services of the State-Federal rehabilitation program. These agencies already have effective working agreements with the medical and other professions that will provide independent living rehabilitation services, as well as with rehabilitation centers and other rehabilitation facilities that will be used in the program. In fact, the addition of the independent living program will not require the addition of any services not now being provided by these agencies to their vocational rehabilitation clients. These services will just be made available to additional groups of the handicapped.

An appropriation of $10 million is authorized for the first year and $20 million for the second, with subsequent amounts to be determined by appropriations. Funds are to be allotted to the States by the use of the population-per capita income formula now used in allotting section 2 funds under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. This amount, matched by State funds, will permit services to at least 6,000 persons the first year and 12,000 the second. The total numbers needing such services are much greater.

REHABILITATION EVALUATION SERVICES

At the present time, there does not exist in the vast majority of our communities, large or small, any one place or agency to which a handicapped person may go with the assurance that he will get the complete and adequate evaluation of his rehabilitation potential. This hit-and-miss method of evaluation, with no one agency responsible, tends to discourage the potential applicant for services. It likewise seriously limits the effectiveness of existing services.

Under the bill the State-Federal rehabilitation program would be given legal responsibility to make comprehensive evaluation services available to all handicapped adults and to refer such handicapped people to the sources of the services most appropriate for them, provided these are services not available in the evaluating agency. These evaluation service would be financed on an open-end basis with the Federal Government paying two-thirds the cost.

Many rehabilitation efforts have failed because of inadequate evaluation at the beginning. Complete evaluation is so fundamental to the proper classification of the handicapped as well as to the provision of suitable services, that we feel the Federal Government should offer maximum encouragement to the States to insure the adequacy of this service. The existence of evaluation services such as described above should be of particular value in the assessment of rehabilitation potential of the hundreds of thousands of individuals who are making application for disability benefits under the old-age and survivors insurance program. It will also be of great value to many other public and voluntary programs.

The addition of independent living rehabilitation services and centralized evaluation to already existing vocational rehabilitation programs will fill the most important gaps in rehabilitation services needed by the handicapped. The need for research, trained personnel, and funds for the implementation of these programs will, of course, be a continuous one. The centralization of these services in the State-Federal rehabilitation program will enable the State agencies to become truly the focal points around which a comprehensive rehabilitation program for all of the handicapped can be built. It should result in vastly improved vocational rehabilitation services as well as provision of services to new groups.

WORKSHOPS AND OTHER REHABILITATION FACILITIES

In 1954, a category of rehabilitation facilities was added to the programs being administered under the Hospital Survey and Construction Act, commonly referred to as the Hill-Burton Act. This new category has been useful in developing medically oriented rehabilitation facilities, principally in connection with hospitals. Rehabilitation workshops and many other supplementary rehabilitation facilities cannot be built under this law. In addition, it has proved difficult to establish vocationally oriented comprehensive centers under this act.

This bill sets up in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, to be administered by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, a program of supplementary rehabilitation facilities. To illustrate, under this legislation public and other nonprofit workshops for the severely handicapped, including the mentally ill, mentally retarded, and cerebral palsied; hearing and speech centers; and vocational rehabilitation centers for the blind will be established or expanded. Provisions are made for the coordination of this program with the Hill-Burton program to avoid duplication. Experience in administration of such a program was gained by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation during the 3 years that funds were available for grants for public and other nonprofit agencies under section 4(a)(2), Public Law 565.

Appropriations of $10 million are authorized for the first year, $12,500,000 for the second, and $15 million for the third. The States are to put up one-third of the cost of facilities. Projects will be approved by and submitted through the State rehabilitation agencies and approved by the Secretary of HEW.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE HANDICAPPED

The President's Committee on the Employment of the Physically Handicapped is responsible for helping to create a climate favorable to the employment of physically handicapped individuals. The Chairman is appointed by the President of the United States. The Committee, itself, is composed of several hundred organizations and individuals who devote a tremendous amount of voluntary effort to promoting the rehabilitation and employment of the handicapped. The only cost to this program to the Federal Government is a small appropriation to support a small staff, which guides and coordinates this voluntary activity. At the present time, the appropriation authorized for this program is limited to $250,000. The increased cost of services as well as the desirability for certain expansion of functions makes necessary an increase of the authorization for the President's Committee. In this bill, an increase to $300,000 is provided.

In my judgment, the States and the Federal Government do not receive a greater return on any money they spend than on the rehabilitation of the handicapped. Not only does rehabilitation pay off in dollars and cents as rehabilitated individuals become taxpayers, but it results in tremendous social gains. It is a kind of program of which the American people are justly proud. This proposed legislation will result, I am sure, in more effective and comprehensive rehabilitation programs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 772) to provide evaluation of rehabilitation potentials and rehabilitation services to handicapped individuals who as a result thereof can achieve such ability of independent living as to dispense with the need for expensive institutional care or who can dispense with or largely dispense with the need of an attendant at home; to assist in the establishment of public and private nonprofit workshops and rehabilitation facilities; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HILL (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

ADDITIONAL INCOME TAX EXEMPTION FOR STUDENTS AT INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER LEARNING

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill providing taxpayers an additional income tax exemption of $1,200 for dependents who are students at institutions of higher learning. This bill also provides the same income tax exemptions for taxpayers who are themselves college or university students.

The steadily mounting costs of tuition, books, and other educational expenses are making it more and more difficult for people of moderate means to afford higher education for their children.

For most people, the years when one's children are away at school are years of terrible financial burdens, which are rapidly becoming impossible to carry. The tax exemption provided in my bill would lessen these burdens to a considerable degree. It would also provide needed tax relief for those students who are working their way through college and who need every dollar for educational purposes.

The problem of financing educational costs is more than a personal problem for millions of people. It is a vital national problem and should be recognized as such in our tax laws.

Parents who make the heavy sacrifice required to pay for education are serving more than their own children. They are making a contribution to the future of their country which is impossible to measure or exaggerate, and they need and deserve the kind of tax assistance provided in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 775) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to allow an additional income exemption of $1,200 for an individual who is a student at an institution of higher education, introduced by Mr. DODD, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PROPOSED DEFENSE FACILITIES PROTECTION ACT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] is unavoidably absent today, I believe, because of illness. He has asked me to introduce a bill for him, and to submit for printing in the RECORD an accompanying statement. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be received as though it were introduced by him, and that the accompanying statement be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 776) to authorize the Federal Government to guard strategic defense facilities against individuals believed to be disposed to commit acts of sabotage, espionage, or other subversion, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN (for Mr. BUTLER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement submitted by Mr. DIRKSEN (for Mr. BUTLER) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ACCOMPANYING INTRODUCTION OF DEFENSE FACILITIES PROTECTION ACT BY SENATOR JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER, JANUARY 29, 1959

On the basis of extensive and repeated exposures of Communist penetration into industrial establishments in this Nation, it is apparent that the defense of the United States in the event of war would be seriously crippled by sabotage and other acts of subversion unless prompt, effective measures could be taken to prevent them. Although we all abhor the thought of another global conflict with the frightening prospects of our cities and industries being laid waste in a matter of minutes, we have no alternative in the present state of the world but to face the grim facts that we must be prepared to meet any eventuality.

What is more certain than that in the event of war between our country and Soviet Russia, the Communist conspiracy in this country will stop at nothing to sap the industrial strength of this Nation by every devilish device of which these trained conspirators are capable. Should we wait until an actual outbreak of hostilities before undertaking to invest in the appropriate governmental authorities power to act effectively to safeguard our industrial establishments against sabotage? As one who has served now for a considerable period of time on the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate, I am convinced that we cannot wait any longer to enact this necessary legislation. After the defense establishments are sabotaged, after our factories are destroyed, it will be too late to take precautionary measures and the punishment of the guilty will not rebuild our factories or supply needed implements of defense.

Briefly, the bill which I have introduced authorizes the President, whenever he finds and proclaims that the security of this Nation is threatened, to prescribe rules and regulations to prevent access to defense facilities by those likely to commit sabotage, espionage, or other subversive acts. Although the bill specifically provides that the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act shall not be applicable to the proceedings, the bill provides that any individual who is barred from access to a defense facility shall be notified in writing of the charges against him and given adequate opportunity to defend himself against such charges. The bill further provides that any such individual summarily barred from access to any defense facility but in whose case the bar is removed as a result of the proceedings shall be compensated by the United States for his loss of earnings.

The bill prescribes certain penalties for a violation of its provisions, and in order to further spell out the safeguards of existing law for the rights of the individuals, the bill contains a provision to the effect that nothing in the bill shall be construed to deprive any individual of any rights or benefits conferred on him by the National Labor Relations Act as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

Although I shall not be averse to amendments which would improve the bill or make it more effective, I am determined to press for enactment of the principles involved in the bill because in my judgment public interest demands that those responsible for administration of the agencies responsible for the public safety be equipped to discharge their duties effectively.

RETROACTIVE PAYMENT OF OLD-AGE INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the retroactive payment of Old-Age Insurance Benefits to farmers under title II of the Social Security Act who retire after having attained more than 65 years of age.

This amendment will help many small farmers who are 65 and over and who are not now covered under the Social Security Law. It will provide that any individual who, whether before or after the date of enactment of this act, becomes entitled to Old-Age Insurance Benefits under title II of the Social Security Act, solely by reason of self-employment income derived by him from any trade or business in which, if it were carried on exclusively by employees, the major portion of the services would constitute agricultural labor, and who, upon first becoming entitled to such benefits, has attained more than 65 years of age shall, notwithstanding any provision of such title to the contrary, be entitled to an old-age insurance benefit under such title for each month after the date he attained 65 years of age.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 777) providing for the retroactive payment of old-age insurance benefits under title II of the Social Security Act to farmers who retire after having attained more than 65 years of age, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAYMENT OF DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS WITHIN 3 MONTHS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Social Security Act to enable a disabled person to receive disability insurance benefits within 3 months. The law now specified a 6-month waiting period.

Mr. President, I am sure that all my colleagues will see the good that my amendment will do and will know of many persons who will be benefited by it. I urge its favorable consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 778) to amend title II of the Social Security Act to reduce from 6 to 3 months the period during which disabled persons must wait before becoming entitled to disability insurance benefits under such title, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ACT OF 1959

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], I introduce a bill to establish national minimum standards of unemployment compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 791) to provide for unemployment reinsurance grants to the States, to revise, extend, and improve the unemployment insurance program, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY, for himself and other Senators, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KENNEDY. The bill would continue the present Federal-State unemployment compensation system, but it would correct inadequacies in the system by establishing minimum standards which every State must meet to be entitled to the benefits provided. In addition, the bill allows the tax which is paid into the Federal Treasury to be used to aid the States whose reserve is depleted by excessive demands upon it.

The proposed bill would—

First. Establish benefits equal to not less than 50 percent of weekly wages so long as that amount is not more than two-thirds of the average weekly wage in the State.

Second. Establish a uniform benefit period of 39 weeks.

Third. Include within the system employers who have one or more individuals in their employ, except for domestic and agricultural employees.

Fourth. Permit States to provide for uniform rate reductions to employers as well as individual experience-rated reductions.

The proposed bill would not—

First. Require any appropriation by Congress.

Second. Change the present Federal-State system of operations.

Third. Provide for any increase in the present Federal tax upon payrolls.

The experience of the 1957–58 recession has demonstrated beyond any lingering doubt that there is a great need for a nationwide minimum standard of unemployment compensation. An adequate law will cushion any recession, alleviate individual hardship, and speed national recovery.

Although we confidently look forward to continued economic expansion and decreasing unemployment in the near future, we must also expect that there will continue to be pockets of unemployment and we must be prepared to combat temporary setbacks to the economy. We must not allow the glowing predictions of prosperity in 1959 to blind us to the fact that over 4 million wage earners are still unemployed. This represents 6 percent of our labor force.

The number of persons exhausting their benefits rose to a peak of 285,000 during the month of July 1958. Since then the temporary unemployment compensation law benefits and the improvement in the economic outlook have reduced the number of persons who exhaust their benefits. But there are still 1,500,000 persons unemployed today who do not receive any benefits but must depend upon private charity or public relief. Hundreds of thousands of others are drawing benefits too small to enable them to pay their basic bills. The tragic fact is that our unemployment program today is too weak and outmoded to do the job for which it was designed. When enacted it replaced at least 50 percent of the loss in wage payments. Today it replaces less than 20 percent of those wages—and in some hard-hit communities still suffering severely it puts back into the streams of commerce as little as 10 percent of lost wages. Unemployed workers today must somehow get by on payments averaging less than $35 per week.

In some States, too, the benefit period is as little as 6 weeks. Thereafter the family must subsist as best it can.

The need for some minimum standard of unemployment insurance has long been recognized. In December 1958, the Federal Council on Employment Security recommended it. In April 1958, the Rockefeller Brothers Report advised that such a law would contribute to the economic stability of the country. The Governors of several States have repeatedly proposed this legislation. Most recently, in both his budget message and in his economic report, the President has pointed out that direct emergency Federal expenditures for unemployment benefits will soon expire and has called for widening the coverage of unemployment compensation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a summary of the provisions of the Kennedy-McCarthy-Case bill.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION STANDARDS BILL

The bill recognizes that in order to achieve the goals of employment stabilization and security against unemployment and in order to strengthen the economy and the welfare of the Nation, certain improvements in the unemployment compensation program are necessary. It extends to certain new categories of workers the benefit of the unemployment compensation program and prescribes certain uniform minimum standards with respect to weekly unemployment compensation benefits and the period of time for which such benefits will be payable. It also provides for the establishment of a fund composed of present Federal unemployment tax collections from which the administrative costs of the program will be paid and from which reinsurance grants will be made to States which suffer excessively high rates of unemployment.

Section 2 of the bill establishes the additional standards which a State law must meet in order to be certified by the Secretary of Labor for the purpose of permitting credit against the Federal tax for employer contributions under the State law. The additional standards cover the following areas: (1) The maximum and minimum weekly benefit amounts provided by the State law; and (2) the duration for which benefits are payable under the State law.

Among those who have recognized the need for Federal minimum benefit standards are:

(a) The Rockefeller Brothers Fund Report of April 1958;

(b) The Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security; and

(c) Dr. Arthur Burns, former economic adviser to President Eisenhower.

1. WEEKLY BENEFIT AMOUNT

Section 2 requires that the maximum benefit under the State law be not less than an amount equal to two-thirds of the average weekly wage within such State. It also requires that subject to this maximum every individual receive a benefit equal to at least one-half of the individual's average weekly wage. In no case would an individual receive a benefit in excess of the State maximum.

Thus, if the average weekly wage in covered employment in State X is $66, the State law must provide a maximum weekly benefit of at least $40. An individual whose average weekly wage is less than $66 would be required to receive a weekly benefit of at least 50 percent of his own wage. The individual who earns $50 a week would only receive a weekly benefit of $25 a week. The individual who earns $60 a week would only receive $30 a week. In no case, however, would State X be required to pay anyone more than $40 weekly. Individuals who receive $80 a week would be entitled to the $40 but no individual who earns more would be paid a greater benefit.

The requirement that individuals be entitled to receive at least 50 percent of their average weekly wage as a necessary goal is consistent with the recommendations made by President Eisenhower in his Economic Report. As Secretary of Labor Mitchell has pointed out in letters to the Governors of all States, a weekly maximum along the lines recommended in this bill is necessary to accomplish the recommendations of the President.

In view of the inaction by State legislatures in meeting these goals, it is clear that if they are to be accomplished, congressional action along the lines recommended by this bill is necessary.

2. BENEFIT DURATION

Section 2 of the bill would require that all eligible individuals be entitled to benefits for at least 39 weeks of unemployment. This does not mean that every individual will automatically receive 39 weeks of benefits in a year. State laws all require that the individual be unemployed and that he be able and available for work during each week of unemployment.

With continued unemployment, the need for benefits of sufficient duration for all unemployed individuals is apparent. President Eisenhower also recommended that duration be uniformly extended for all claimants. While his recommendation to the States was limited to duration of 26 weeks, the continuation of heavy unemployment and the continued increase in the number of persons exhausting the benefit rights indicate the present need for benefits for a duration of longer than 26 weeks. The need for 39 weeks has already been recognized by the last Congress which enacted the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958.

3. SUPPLEMENTAL UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

The only standard with respect to disqualification provisions of State laws applies to benefits paid under privately establishd supplemental benefit plans. Section 2 would specifically preclude the denial or reduction of State benefits because of the receipt of private supplemental unemployment benefits. Only four States now reduce benefits because of the receipt of SUB. Thirty-eight States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii hold that the payment of supplemental unemployment benefits does not affect an individual's right to State unemployment compensation benefits.

Subsection (a) of section 3 of the bill extends the coverage of the Federal Unemployment Tax Act to employers of one or more individuals.

The extension of coverage to employers of one or more is consistent with the recommendations made by President Eisenhower. It does not mean that housewives who employ a domestic or a farmer employing one individual from time to time will have to pay unemployment contributions with respect to such individual. The present definition of employment which excludes domestic and agricultural service is not changed in this bill.

Subsection (c) of section 3 adds definitions of "benefit year," "base period," "high quarter wages," and "average weekly wage" to the present definitions. These definitions are necessary in order to avoid contravention by a State of the amendments proposed in subsection (a).

Section 4 would give additional freedom to the State in determining the methods of reducing employer's taxes under the State law below 2.7 percent. Under present law, if a State wishes to impose a tax lower than 2.7 percent on employers, it may only do so by instituting a system which rates individual employers on the basis of their own experience. A State which desires to levy a uniform rate of less than 2.7 percent on all employers is now unable to do so.

This amendment would permit a State to levy a uniform contribution rate of less than 2.7 percent. It would also permit a State which desires to continue a system of individual employer experience rates to continue to do so. In short, it imposes no new Federal requirement; it relaxes the existing requirements.

Section 5 amends those provisions of the Social Security Act relating to grants to States for administration of State unemployment compensation laws by providing that all collections under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act are earmarked in the Federal unemployment account in the unemployment trust fund. This account was established by Congress in 1947.

Section 5 provides that all funds for administration of State laws, including contingency amounts which are to be expended only in the event of unforeseen changes in economic conditions, shall be charged against the Federal unemployment account. Unemployment compensation administrative expenditures of the Department of Labor shall also be charged to the Federal unemployment account.

Section 6 repeals provisions of the present law inconsistent with the changes made in this bill.

Section 7 provides that a State whose accumulated funds for unemployment compensation have reached a precariously low condition will be entitled to a reinsurance grant from the Federal unemployment account. The amount of such grant will be limited to three-fourths of the excess by which compensation payable under such State law exceeds 2 percent of the State taxable payroll. In other words, only where unemployment benefits cannot be financed through a 2 percent contribution rate will the State receive any Federal grant. To the extent that its costs exceed 2 percent, it will still be required to finance one-fourth of the costs out of State funds.

In order, however, to avoid the possibility of a State permitting its fund to reach a precariously low condition in order to receive a Federal grant, the bill requires that as one of the conditions of eligibility that whenever a State's fund drops below 6 percent, it imposes a minimum rate of contribution of at least 1.2 percent.

Section 7 changes title IX of the Social Security Act and makes certain technical changes in section 904 in order to achieve consistency with the substantive amendments proposed by the bill.

Section 8 of the bill provides that the above provisions extending coverage and establishing benefit standards which must be met by State laws shall be effective as of July 1, 1960. This would give to the States sufficient time to make the necessary statutory changes in their State unemployment compensation laws before the standards become effective.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, a statement by one of the distinguished cosponsors of the bill, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE].

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CASE, OF NEW JERSEY

I am glad to join with Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY and Senator EUGENE J. MCCARTHY as a principal cosponsor in offering a bill establishing Federal standards for unemployment compensation. Twenty-eight other Senators are joining in this move.

The bill would require that compensation benefits be not less than 50 percent of weekly wages, provided that amount is not more than two-thirds of the average weekly wage in the State. It would establish a uniform benefit period of 39 weeks and permit States to authorize uniform rate reductions to employers as well as individual experience rated reductions.

The bill would require no appropriation by Congress and no increase in the present Federal tax on payrolls.

The unemployment compensation system has been recognized as a first line of defense for millions of American families when there is a downward turn in our economy. The program is one of the built-in stabilizers for our dynamic economy. But it must be kept up to date in order to be effective.

For several years President Eisenhower has urged the States to strengthen standards which in many cases are antiquated. The recent recession emphasized the plight of unemployed workers who were faced with inadequate payments for an inadequate period. The results were not only felt by their families, but had an impact on the entire community in which they live.

When this insurance program was first enacted, it replaced at least 50 percent of the loss in wage payments. By now the figure has declined to less than 20 percent. And it affects a great many Americans. We still have unemployment numbering 4,108,000, or 6.1 percent of the country's labor force. Of this number some 2,599,000 persons are drawing unemployment compensation benefits. Although we expect the economic upturn to continue, some areas of unemployment are still likely for some time to come.

In New Jersey, for example, we still have 7.9 percent of our State labor force on the unemployment rolls. This 188,000 includes about 133,000 now receiving unemployment insurance.

In the competition for industrial plants among the States, unemployment benefits are frequently kept low. The result of this is to penalize States which try to provide adequate benefits. We need a Federal floor to assure minimum standards. In Bergen County, N.J., we have recently lost a substantial source of employment to the State of Virginia. In Virginia the average unemployment insurance tax rate is only 0.4 percent of taxable payrolls, compared with 1.9 percent for New Jersey.

There is a plant in Essex County, N.J., which is now planning to move its facilities to Kentucky and Texas. While I realize there are many factors involved in plant relocation, it is possible that one of them may be that the unemployment insurance tax rate in Texas is six-tenths of 1 percent and that in Kentucky some 19 percent of all employers pay no tax toward benefit amounts.

A study of unemployment insurance programs in the States makes it hard to escape the conclusion that some States have kept their unemployment benefit levels and tax rates low in order to attract new industry. Those State legislatures that want to improve outmoded unemployment insurance standards are unable to do an adequate job because they fear the loss of industry to States with substandard benefit rates. The only answer is the establishment of reasonable minimum standards to which all States must adhere. This is what our bill would do.

The effect of interstate competition to attract industry is particularly hard on employers when a recession is concentrated in a few States. Certainly, this is true of New Jersey which has had a heavy payout of unemployment compensation benefits during the recession period with a consequent draining of the State unemployment compensation fund. The replenishing of this fund will make the tax differential between New Jersey and other States even wider.

The Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Security has urged enactment of legislation along the lines of the bill being offered by the group of Senators which I am joining. Similar views have been expressed in the Rockefeller Brothers Report and by Arthur F. Burns, president of the National Bureau of Economic Research, and former Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

PROPOSED EDUCATIONAL LEGISLATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills relating to education. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me relating to the bills, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

S. 794. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to allow a taxpayer to deduct certain expenses incurred by him in obtaining a higher education; and

S. 795. A bill to allow additional income tax exemptions for a taxpayer or a spouse, or a dependent child under 23 years of age, who is a full-time student at an educational institution above the secondary level.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

I have today introduced, for appropriate reference, two bills which I consider essential to the development of our educational institutions and the overall educational standards of our country. This is the third time I have introduced these bills and I am hopeful the Congress will give consideration to them during this session.

The first bill would allow an additional income tax exemption for a taxpayer or a spouse, or a dependent child under 23 years of age, who is a full-time student at an educational institution above the secondary level. The exemption may be claimed by the taxpayer himself, or on account of a spouse or a dependent child under the age of 23, who is in attendance on a full-time basis at an educational institution above the secondary level.

The second bill would allow a taxpayer who is a student in an institution of higher learning to deduct expenses for books, tuition, fees, and other supplies necessary to pursue their course of instruction. This bill is primarily designed to assist those students who work their own way through college and would apply to both full-time and part-time students, whether self-supporting or supported by outside sources.

Since I have been a Member of the Congress, I have supported virtually every measure designed to assist our students and to improve our educational institutions and facilities. These bills will assist students in achieving the goals they seek through adequate educational opportunities. Because I am convinced the problem of improving our educational system continues to be one of our most pressing problems, I am once again introducing these bills.

The cost of a college education continues to rise. Costs vary. I believe it reasonable to estimate the average cost at $1,500 a year, or roughly $6,000 for a regular 4-year college education. Of course, the cost of the more specialized courses in science and medicine are quite often more, and yet the parent, or the individual, receives only a $600 a year tax exemption. Consequently, there is little incentive provided in our tax laws for one to pursue an educational goal.

Last year we were vitally concerned with the challenge of the sputnik in the air. We are meeting this challenge, but we must realize it is necessary in the forthcoming years to continue producing scientists in order to compete with the Soviet Union in the development of missiles and space rockets. The Russians are producing scientists and engineers at a much more rapid pace than are we. During this decade of 1950 through 1960 the Soviet Union is expected to produce 1,200,000 scientists and engineers as compared to our 900,000. There has been a continued and serious deterioration in the general quality of our education and our educational standards during the past decade, and if we are to succeed in our role of world leadership, it is essential that we produce citizens who have wisdom, vision, foresight, and the knowledge to compete successfully with grave world problems.

Assuming the objective of these bills is a proper one, it seems to me more efficient, in the long run, to encourage and enable a parent to pay for his children's education than it is for the Government to assume the burden of educating its citizens.

In addition to these reasons, enactment of these proposals will, I believe, add to the income of the Government, as well as the gross income of its individual citizens. It has been estimated male college graduates will receive an average of $100,000 more in lifetime income than the average high school graduate. We must remember that this income will be fully taxed. Under existing tax laws, if one pays $1,000 for an acre of land and sells it for $2,000, he pays only on the increment of $1,000 at reduced capital gains rates. If he pays $1,000 for a truck to be used in his business and takes in $2,000 in drayage fees, the cost of the truck amortized over its useful life is deductible from the $2,000 income earned. However, if he spends $1,000 for an education and as a result his income is increased $1,000 per year, the tax laws do not allow application of these theories. He receives no deduction for the thousand dollars which he has invested in his eduction. The yearly increase in his income of $1,000 is taxed in full as ordinary income.

As I said a moment ago, it is my firm conviction that to encourage the education of our young people is in the national interest. To provide for properly educated citizens is a great challenge. These bills will provide some incentive to students and parents to meet and accept this challenge. In addition to these considerations, both public and private educational institutions face a precarious future. They are essential to the preservation of our way of life. These bills, if enacted, would give them some assistance and enable them to accept additional students who can pay their own way. Thus, the bills would have a further beneficial effect on the finances of our fine educational institutions. It is my hope the Congress will favorably consider these bills.

AMENDMENTS OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954 AND FEDERAL POWER ACT

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce two bills for appropriate reference. The first bill will amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to prohibit the allowance, as a business deduction, expenses incurred by electric power companies in propagandizing against Federal electric power policies and rural electric cooperatives. The second bill provides for an amendment to the Federal Power Act so as to prohibit the Federal Power Commission, in exercising their ratemaking power with respect to the transmission and sale of electric energy subject to its jurisdiction, from treating as operating expenses those expenses incurred by electric utilities in propagandizing against Federal power policies and REA.

Mr. President, testimony before congressional committees has revealed that electric power companies have spent millions of dollars in so-called advertisements in magazines and other media in propagandizing against Federal electric power policies and REA. These advertisements made it appear the Federal Government was losing money in Federal taxes, whereas the record disclosed that the principal purpose of the REA and Federal electric power policies were for the purpose of giving cheaper power rates to areas where many private electric power companies had refused to venture and serve until after the Federal electric power and REA had been instituted. The witnesses who have appeared before congressional committees have testified that the public utilities have listed, as expenses, before the FPC in utility rate hearings, the costs of such advertising propaganda against Government policies dealing with Federal electric power and rural electric cooperatives.

Mr. President, it is bad enough for the electric power companies to attack the Federal Government's electric power policy and the REA, but in my opinion it adds insult to injury to permit the electric power companies to make the Federal Government pay for it through permitting a tax deduction on income taxes for the advertisements and, further, for the public to pay for such propaganda through higher rates due to the cost of such propaganda.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. LANGER, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated:

To the Committee on Finance:

S. 797. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to prohibit the allowance as a business deduction of expenses incurred by electric power companies in propagandizing against Federal electric power policies and rural electric cooperatives.

To the Committe on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

S. 798. A bill to amend the Federal Power Act so as to prohibit the Federal Power Commission, in exercising their ratemaking power with respect to the transmission and sale of electric energy subject to its jurisdiction, from treating as operating expenses those expenses incurred by electric utilities in propagandizing against Federal power policies and rural electric cooperatives.

AMENDMENT OF WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. A companion bill is being introduced today in the House of Representatives by Representative JOHN BLATNIK.

The purpose of the bill is to expand the existing construction grants program for sewage treatment works, by increasing Federal participation and liberalizing eligibility requirements. The importance of expanding this program cannot be too strongly emphasized. The demand for fresh, clean water is increasing at an exceedingly fast rate while the supply of water is remaining fairly constant. As a result we do not have sufficien waste treatment facilities to keep our water supply from further pollution. In order to meet the increasing demand for clean water it is necessary that we have more sewage treatment plants to reduce the discharges of raw waste into streams and on the ground.

Public Law 660 of the 84th Congress, which authorized $500 million to be spent in matching funds to help communities build sewage disposal plants, has stimulated the greatest waste treatment construction program in our Nation's history. Good as this program has been, it is still far from adequate to meet the continually expanding need for water. It is for this reason that I offer this bill to expand the program.

The main provisions of this bill are as follows:

First. Grants for any one project would be raised from $250,000 to $500,000.

Second. Authorized annual grants for State approved municipal sewage treatment plants would be increased from $50 million to $100 million.

Third. Municipalities which join together in a joint construction project would no longer be limited, as under present law, to only one grant, but rather each such municipality for purposes of maximum limitations on grants would be considered as engaged in a separate project.

Fourth. Unobligated funds could be reallocated among States having projects approved and awaiting availability of grant funds; under present law unobligated funds lapse at the end of the fiscal year in which they are allotted.

Fifth. An Office of Water Pollution Control would be established within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Sixth. The Office of Water Pollution Control would be required to submit to the Congress a report on the activities and future plans of the Federal Water Pollution Control program within 1 year after passage of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 805) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to increase grants for construction of sewage treatment works; to establish the Office of Water Pollution Control; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and Mr. MCCARTHY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

PROTECTION OF TRAVEL RIGHTS OF CERTAIN PERSONS, AND ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. ANDERSON], the Senators from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS and Mr. SYMINGTON], and the Senators from Oregon [Mr. MORSE and Mr. NEUBERGER], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to protect the travel rights of persons owing allegance to the United States and to govern the issuance of passports.

This bill is identical to S. 4137 which I and several of my colleagues introduced on July 15 of last year. It provides that any American citizen, or national, or any other person entitled to the protection of the United States is entitled to a passport as a matter of right within 30 days of filing a written application, upon establishment of identity and payment of fees.

The restrictions on the right to travel as contained in the bill are:

First. In time of war the President has complete control over the travel of persons into, or out of, the United States.

Second. The President is authorized to issue regulations prohibiting the entry of American citizens into combat areas when U.S. forces are participating in hostilities which have not been formalized by a declaration of war.

Third. The Secretary of State may refuse to issue a passport to, or limit the use of a passport by, any person under indictment, information, or sentence for the commission of a felony.

In addition, this bill does not repeal that part of the Internal Security Act of 1950 which prohibits the application for, or use of, a passport by persons who are members of an organization against which a final order has been handed down by the Subversive Activities Control Board.

This bill, Mr. President, is based upon the principle as set forth recently by the Supreme Court that "the right to travel is a part of the liberty of which the citizens cannot be deprived without the due process of law of the fifth amendment." This right was emerging as a part of the Anglo-Saxon law as early as the Magna Carta which provided in article 42 that it was lawful for any person to leave and reenter England except in time of war. This article excepted from this right only prisoners, outlaws, and people of nations at war with England.

I believe very firmly that the right to travel is one of our most precious freedoms. It should be limited by the Government only where the national interest clearly demands it, and only where the people as a whole benefit thereby.

This bill seeks to recognize the clear requirements of the Nation's security while at the same time assuring the freedom of travel as set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

This bill has been criticized by some as not going far enough and by others as going too far. We in offering this measure do not claim that it is perfect or that it will solve all the problems which may arise in the field of travel. A great deal of thought and effort have, however, gone into this bill. It is a sincere attempt to protect one of the basic liberties of the American people.

It is my strong conviction that in the present world struggle between the forces of freedom and tyranny we must not permit, in the name of necessity, our freedoms to be gradually whittled away. Our Nation must stand out as a beacon of freedom for all the world to see.

Mr. President, I would be derelict in my duty in introducing this bill if I did not pay special tribute to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] who took part in drafting this bill, and for his long and tireless effort in behalf of the preservation of our civil rights and liberties. As the chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Missouri has been rendering yeoman service. One of the fields of special study and emphasis by the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights has been the right to travel and U.S. passport policies. Those of us who believe that there should be fewer and less arbitrary restriction on the right to travel, are indebted to the Senator from Missouri and to his excellent subcommittee.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the bill along with a short summary of its provisions be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and summary will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 806) to protect the travel rights of persons owing allegiance to the United States and to govern the issuance of passports, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Right to Travel Abroad Act".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that freedom of movement is basic in the scheme of American institutions and includes both travel within the country as well as travel abroad; that the right to travel abroad is a part of the liberty of which citizens and nationals of the United States or persons entitled to the protection of the United States cannot be deprived without due process of law under the fifth amendment to the Constitution; that such right should not be restricted but is subject to the war power granted to the President and the Congress of the United States under the Constitution and also is subject to the exercise of the inherent power of the state to prosecute persons for the commission of crimes. It is also the sense of the Congress that at the present time the crucial function of a passport is control over entry or exit; and that no tests of beliefs or associations shall be applied to issuance of passports.

SEC. 3. (a) Within thirty days following the date of a written application therefor, the Secretary of State shall issue a passport to any citizen or national of the United States or to any person otherwise entitled to the protection of the United States upon proof of identity and payment of fees established by law: Provided, however, That the Secretary of State may refuse or limit the issuance of passports only where the provisions of section 4 of this Act apply.

(b) Persons enumerated in the preceding subsection shall be referred to hereinafter as "persons under this Act".

SEC. 4. The following are the only restrictions which may be imposed by the Government of the United States upon the travel abroad of persons under this Act:

(a) Following a declaration of war by the Congress, the President may issue regulations and modify or revoke such regulations to govern the movement of persons out of, or into, the United States and its possessions. Upon the termination of the war, any such regulations still in effect shall be revoked automatically.

(b) Following the outbreak of hostilities in which Armed Forces of the United States participate, the President may issue regulations and modify or revoke such regulations to govern the movement of persons under this Act in designated combat areas. Upon the cessation of hostilities, any such regulations still in effect shall be revoked automatically.

(c) The Secretary of State may refuse to issue a passport to, or limit the use of a passport by, any person under indictment, information, or sentence for the commission of a felony.

SEC. 5. (a) Following a determination by the President that temporarily the United States may not be able to give its usual protection to persons under this Act traveling in certain designated areas of the world, the Secretary of State shall (1) publish, (2) inform each passport applicant of, and (3) inform the Congress of, this determination and the reasons therefor, such as lack of diplomatic relations or threatened or existing hostilities or disturbances in which Armed Forces of the United States are not participating.

(b) The President shall not forbid travel in these areas by persons under this Act.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of State shall have authority to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to administer this Act.

The provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act shall be applicable to all proceedings for the issuance, limitation, denial, or revocation of passports under this Act and to all rulemaking under this Act, but the exceptions in sections 3, 4, and 5 of the Administrative Procedure Act shall not apply to this Act.

SEC. 7. (a) The following Acts or parts of Acts and all amendments thereto are repealed on the effective date of this Act:

(1) Section 4076 of the Revised Statutes (32 Stat. 386).

(2) Section 1 of title IX of the Act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 227).

(3) Section 1 of the Act of July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 887).

(4) That part of section 2 of the Act of July 3, 1926, as amended (44 Stat. 837; 46 Stat. 839; 47 Stat. 157), which provides that the Secretary of State may limit the validity of a passport, passport visa or the period of renewal of a passport to less than two years.

(5) Subsection (b) of section 215 of title II of the Act of June 27, 1952 (66 Stat. 190).

(b) All other statutes and regulations in conflict or inconsistent with provisions of this Act are, to the extent of such conflict or inconsistency, repealed on the effective date of this Act.

SEC. 8. This Act shall take effect at 12:01 o'clock antemeridian United States eastern standard time on the fifteenth day immediately following the date of its enactment.

SUMMARY OF THE "RIGHT TO TRAVEL ABROAD ACT" BY MR. HUMPHREY

Section 1 states that the act may be cited as the "Right To Travel Abroad Act."

Section 2 is a declaration of policy that the Congress joins the executive and judicial branches of the Government in affirming a constitutional right to travel by citizens, nationals, and other persons entitled to the protection of the United States.

Under section 3, any American citizen or national, or any other person entitled to the protection of the United States would be entitled to a passport as a matter of right within 30 days of filing a written application, upon establishment of identity and payment of fees. The only restrictions to this right are contained in section 4.

Subsection (a) provides that in time of war, the President shall have complete control over travel of persons into, or out of, the United States. This is a valid recognition of constitutional war powers. This would include the power to refuse to issue passports, as well as the power to limit the use of passports which may be issued.

Subsection (b) gives the President the power to issue regulations prohibiting the entry of American citizens into combat areas when U.S. forces are participating in hostilities which have not been formalized by a declaration of war. The President would not be given authority to refuse passports or limit them other than as to combat zones.

There is no provision in this bill for limitation upon the issuance or use of passports in times of so-called national emergencies; as far as the issuance of passports is concerned, the United States has been in a "national emergency" since 1940, and there are no prospects for a voluntary revocation of this status by the executive branch in the foreseeable future. If passports and travel can be limited in time of "national emergency," there will be no freedom of travel.

Subsection (c) provides that the Secretary of State may refuse or limit a passport to any person under indictment, information, or sentence for the commission of a felony. This restriction was specifically recognized by the Supreme Court in its recent decisions.

Any American Communists who have been indicted or convicted of a felony under Federal or State law fall within the provisions of section 4(c). In time of war or hostilities, American Communists would come within the restrictions of subsections (a) and (b) of section 4. In addition, this act does not repeal (see section 7) that part of the Internal Security Act of 1950 which prohibits the application for, or use of, a passport by persons who are members of an organization against which a final order has been handed down by the Subversive Activities Control Board (sec. 6 of title I of the act of Sept. 23, 1950; 64 Stat. 993).

Section 5 would prohibit the present practice of the State Department to proscribe large areas of the world as out of bounds to traveling Americans. This section would authorize the President to declare that certain areas are dangerous and that American citizens traveling in these areas cannot expect to receive the usual protection afforded our citizens abroad. This is, in effect, a travel at your own risk section. It would allow newsmen, businessmen, missionaries, and others to travel anywhere in the world, with a warning of danger in advance that certain areas are dangerous.

Section 5 would end the State Department's paternalistic attitude toward American citizens. It would also end the Department's practice of using the travel of private American citizens as a tool of foreign policy.

Procedural due process and judicial review are provided by section 6 which makes the Administrative Procedure Act available with no exceptions. Thus, even in proceedings involving the proof of identity and citizenship (or nationality or that the person is otherwise entitled to the protection of the United States), the high due process standards of the Administrative Procedure Act must be met. This means that unidentified informants or secret dossiers cannot be used. Some of these rights are: The right to a determination solely on the open record, right to counsel, right to confront any adverse witness and cross-examine him.

Section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act provides judicial review of an adverse ruling or determination.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for 7 days to permit additional cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], on behalf of both of us, and perhaps other Senators, has introduced a bill relating to the right to travel, known as the passport bill.

I thank the senior Senator from Minnesota for his very kind remarks, and I believe that he is minimizing his own valuable work in this field. As a most able member of the Foreign Relations Committee, to which the bill will be referred, he has been in the forefront of those of us who feel that the free citizen's right to travel is not something to be tampered with unless the citizen has been officially charged or is under sentence for a serious crime or unless conditions of war or conflict make it necessary that foreign travel become subject to emergency regulations.

The bill introduced today by the Senator from Minnesota and sponsored by several other Senators and myself is, as the Senator from Minnesota so generously pointed out, very largely the product of extensive and exhaustive hearings and study by the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. I am very glad to have had a part in the drafting of this vital legislation.

I have on my desk three volumes amounting to over 1,000 pages which deal with our Nation's passport policies and with the free citizen's right to travel. All of these pages boil down to just one basic idea, that the right to travel is just as basic to free Americans as is the right of free speech.

Mr. President in recent years there has been an alarming tendency within the executive branch of the Government to limit this right. The Secretary of State has assumed that he has the absolute authority to limit the travel abroad of Americans. All American citizens have been barred from entering certain countries in the world. Certain Americans have been barred from going abroad at all, except to countries in the Western Hemisphere. The free citizen's right to travel has been made secondary to the dictates of the Nation's foreign policies. This right has been limited for the purpose of "slapping the wrist" of certain other nations. This may be convenient for the Secretary of State, but it does a grievous wrong to the free citizen.

As the distinguished occupant of the chair well knows, this assumption of authority by the Secretary of State was strongly censured by the U.S. Supreme Court in the recent Kent and Dayton decisions. The Court's decisions affirm the convictions held by the Senator from Minnesota and myself. These decisions, however, deal with specific cases, and do not constitute a general shield against limiting the right to travel. The decisions do not even deal with the assumed right to ban travel by free Americans to certain sections of the world.

Mr. President, the bill introduced today by the Senator from Minnesota, and which I have the honor to sponsor with him, does offer such a shield. It offers protection, not only to individual American citizens, but to the Nation as a whole, for it takes into consideration the overriding conditions under which the right to travel must be regulated in order to preserve the security of the Nation during time of hostilities. I am very happy to join with the Senator from Minnesota in sponsoring this bill. I shall, of course, support it strongly, and I hope our Senate colleagues will give this timely legislation their attention and support.

INSPECTIONS AND INVESTIGATIONS IN METALLIC AND NONMETALLIC MINES AND QUARRIES, RELATING TO HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill relating to certain inspections and investigations in metallic and nonmetallic mines and quarries, excluding coal and lignite mines.

The purpose of this bill is to obtain accurate data relating to health and safety conditions, accidents, and occupational diseases in the mining industry.

I am joined in sponsoring this bill by Senators HOWARD CANNON, JOSEPH CLARK, HUBERT HUMPHREY, ESTES KEFAUVER, MIKE MANSFIELD, EUGENE MCCARTHY, FRANK MOSS, and WILLIAM PROXMIRE.

It is my hope that hearings will be held very soon on this important measure which affects the miners in my part of the country and other sections of the Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 811) relating to certain inspections and investigations in metallic and nonmetallic mines and quarries (excluding coal and lignite mines) for the purpose of obtaining information relating to health and safety conditions, accidents, and occupational diseases therein, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

QUALIFICATIONS OF SUPREME COURT JUSTICES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court clearly indicate both a nonjudicial approach and ignorance of existing conditions in the various sections of our country.

I believe the Supreme Court desegregation decision to be the outstanding judicial blunder of all times. This blunder was compounded last fall when the members of the Court ordered immediate integration at Little Rock, and, in so doing, broke at least three historic precedents in judicial proceedings. First, they attempted to rule out private-school plans, when this case was not before the Court; second, they asserted that they made a certain statement in their 1954 decree which cannot be found there; and third, they affixed the signatures of three new Justices to the 1954 decision, although they were not present for the arguments and the decisions in that case.

In the desegregation decisions, the Court has done irreparable harm to the country by application of a wholly unjudicial approach. Although I consider the decisions in the education field as the most outrageous examples of this approach, it is by no means the only example. It is only a part of the overall story.

The Court's usurpations have practically reduced sovereign States to mere political subdivisions of an oligarchy.

The Court has arrogated to itself powers rightfully belonging to the Congress. It has usurped powers of the executive branch.

It has thwarted efforts of both the Congress and the executive branch to insure the internal security of our country.

It has unleashed on society self-confessed rapists, murderers, and other criminals.

It has repeatedly substituted its opinions for the Constitution and law.

It has shown a complete lack of knowledge of the underlying reasons for the doctrine of stare decisis.

The Congress, as the direct representatives of the people, has an obligation to protect the Constitution from those in positions of power who lack respect for that document and the principles of Government enunciated therein. Congress is also obligated to protect the American people from the judicial tyranny which flouts the rights of every citizen of this country.

To continue to ignore the Supreme Court's abuses is to court disaster. Our obligation can be discharged only by facing the issue and dealing with it in unequivocal terms.

As one step in the direction of returning the Court to its proper sphere of activity, I introduce, and send to the desk, a bill to amend the criteria of qualifications for Supreme Court Justices.

This bill would require, as a prerequisite to appointment as Chief Justice of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, a minimum of 5 years judicial experience on a district court or circuit court of appeals of the United States, or an appellate court or court of general jurisdiction of one of the several States. It would further provide for a rotation of these appointees among the several judicial circuits of the United States.

I sincerely hope that this measure will be given early and favorable action by the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 813) to establish qualifications for persons appointed to the Supreme Court, introduced by Mr. THURMOND, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AID TO EDUCATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for aid to education by returning to each State a proportion of the Federal income taxes collected within the State.

I have modified the bill in accordance with the colloquy, which benefited me very greatly, almost a year ago with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I think in its present form, the bill could overcome a very serious obstacle which has prevented bills for Federal aid to education from passing in the past.

The bill contains an equalization provision which would provide eventually that each and every State could retain approximately $100 for each school-age child. A child in Wisconsin would get the same assistance in education as a child in Mississippi, Illinois, or New York.

No Federal interference with State and local control of education would be involved. This is because each State simply would get a part of the income taxes paid by its own residents to use as it saw fit in its own educational program. This means that the Nation can get on with the very urgent job of building schoolhouses and paying good teachers, without having first to settle all the philosophical problems which beset any plan that involves a hint of Federal supervision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 816) to provide financial assistance to the States for educational purposes by returning to the States a portion of the Federal income taxes collected therein, introduced by Mr. PROXMIRE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR EASTERN AND WESTERN DISTRICTS OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk, for appropriate reference, a bill introduced by me on behalf of myself and the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], to provide five additional Federal district court judgeships for Pennsylvania, three for the eastern district of Pennsylvania and two for the western district, as recommended by the 1958 Judicial Conference.

These additional judges are desperately needed in Pennsylvania. In spite of heroic efforts by the judges now sitting in these courts, the backlog of cases is worse than ever.

In the eastern district there were 4,932 civil and criminal cases pending at the end of fiscal 1958. This means that each of the 8 judges in the district has a staggering caseload of 549 cases waiting disposition. It would take 2 years for the judges to dispose of this backlog if no new cases were filed, but instead, new cases are being started at a record rate. Only 1 of the 85 other district courts in the country has a larger number of pending cases.

The situation in the western district is equally bad. The latest figures on the backlog there, where there are only 6 judges, show a total of 2,308 cases pending. The average delay from time of filing to time of trial in civil cases in this district is listed as 31 months, 2½ times the national average.

Mr. President, in the 1958 Annual Report of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts it is stated that a delay of more than 15 months from filing to trial "may very well amount to a denial of justice."

Only the prompt enactment of legislation creating additional judgeships in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, where similar backlogs exist, will prove American determination to make our judicial system work effectively.

I hope very much that the leadership of my party in both Houses of Congress will give their support to bills which will make it possible to bring our Federal court functions up to date and relieve the present congestion.

I hope that we will not feel that we must wait until 1961—when, of course, we will elect a Democrat President of the United States—before we can remedy this crying injustice, because justice delayed is justice denied.

In making that comment, I should like to add a note of mild criticism with respect to the failure of the administration to fill the vacancy which occurred in the eastern district of Pennsylvania on May 1, 1958, when Chief Judge William Kirkpatrick, who has been a very effective and wonderful judge and who has given a lifetime of service to the administration of justice in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, resigned. The quickest way of alleviating the condition in these overloaded courts would be, pending the passage of the bill we are introducing, by the appointment of a judge to fill that vacancy.

I know that politics sometimes must take priority—although it should not take priority—over public interest, but I hope that our friends on the other side of the aisle who are interested in the appointment in Pennsylvania will resolve their differences so that the vacancy may be filled and at least a part of the backlog removed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 818) to provide for the appointment of three additional district judges for the eastern district of Pennsylvania and two additional judges for the western district of Pennsylvania, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and Mr. SCOTT), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT OF 1958

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 in order to repeal certain provisions requiring affidavits of loyalty and allegiance. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by me relating to the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 819) to amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 in order to repeal certain provisions requiring affidavits of loyalty and allegiance, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. CLARK, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The statement presented by Mr. KENNEDY is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR KENNEDY

I am introducing today, on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, a bill to eliminate the loyalty-oath provision of the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

This provision, subsection (F) of section 1001, presently requires those scholars, scientists, teachers, mathematicians, and other students who apply for a loan or grant under this program to sign an oath of loyalty with an affidavit declaring that they do not believe in, belong to, or support any subversive organization. This subsection received very little attention when the bill passed the Congress last year. It should receive more attention now.

No thought was given, to my knowledge, to the question of how this section would be enforced, who would investigate the veracity of these affidavits, who would determine whether students who did not belong to any subversive organization might have said something indicating "support," or where the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare was going to find the money to police this provision.

Nor was there any discussion as to what danger to the Nation was being avoided by this requirement or why Congress was singling out recipients of Federal scholarships and student loans and not those who receive old-age benefits, crop loans, or other unrelated payments.

Card-carrying members of the Communist Party, of course, have no hesitancy about perjuring themselves in such an affidavit. This provision will not keep them out of the program. But it may well keep out those who resent such a requirement, those who find it distasteful or humiliating, those who are overapprehensive in their interpretation or who fear unnecessarily the Government's interpretation of their views, or those who are conscientiously opposed to test oaths. To be sure, most of those thus excluded by this provision might be said to be nonconformists and dissenters—but surely, in our efforts to attract into scientific pursuits the best talents, the most inquiring minds of our Nation, we do not wish to exclude the nonconformists and the dissenters. Those who are willing to sign such an affidavit are not always by that act necessarily proven to be either more loyal or more talented than those who do not sign.

The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is understandably concerned about how this provision is to be implemented and its implementation financed. The presidents of our leading universities—including most recently the presidents of Yale, Harvard, and Princeton—are understandably concerned about the effect of this provision on the program, on their students, and on the academic freedom of their institutions—institutions which, in the words Jefferson prescribed for the University of Virginia, should be "based on the illimitable freedom of the human mind." And we in the Congress should be concerned, Mr. President, as to whether this unnecessary, futile gesture toward the memory of an earlier age will not defeat the very purposes of last year's bill. For, unlike the Soviets, we cannot take steps to keep our brightest minds in scientific careers—but we can take steps that keep them out. That is the great danger of this provision—and I hope this Congress will strike it.

PROPOSED 4-YEAR TERM FOR MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that the term of office of Members of the House of Representatives shall be 4 years.

Proponents of a 4-year term for our colleagues on the other side of the Capitol have often been accused of tampering with the Constitution and our American traditions. I find that 170 years ago there was no majority of opinion in favor of a 2-year term, and I feel that the supporting arguments for a 4-year term have advanced in this modern and more complex age.

A 4-year term would provide for greater harmony between the President and the House of Representatives. Many argue that a 4-year term will keep a Representative away from his constituents. I do not think a Congressman's closeness to his constituents is dependent upon his short term of office; but, instead, I believe his closeness is dependent on the generally smaller and more compact size of his district, as opposed to that of a Senator, who in many cases represents States with large land areas and millions of people.

A 4-year term would give a Representative an opportunity to perform a greater service to his constituents, devoting more time to legislative duties. Under the present system a Congressman must devote the early part of his term to organization, and then it seems that he must begin thinking about getting reelected; and this problem of reelection looms very large during the second year of his term.

Biennial elections result in the loss from the House of Representatives of many experienced Members. Our society is now so complex that we can ill afford to be without their wisdom and experience. In addition, 2 years is by no means long enough for a Representative to learn his job, which is one of the most complicated, demanding, and responsible in the world. I think that those of us here in the Senate who have served in the House can testify to that. I am confident that a 4-year term would make it possible for each Congressman to become more effective in serving the people of his district.

Campaign and election costs have grown steadily, and there is no reason to think they will decrease. Good men may be discouraged from running for the House of Representatives because they feel they cannot afford it. If a Representative did not have to run every 2 years the costs certainly would be reduced.

My proposal provides for the election of half of the House Members every 2 years; and the provisions of this joint resolution meet the problems of redistricting.

A 4-year term for the Members of the House of Representatives would, in my opinion, enhance and contribute to the legislative process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the text of my joint resolution printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 36) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that the term of office of Members of the House of Representatives shall be 4 years, introduced by Mr. MANSFIELD, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen by the people of the several States and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. Except as hereinafter provided in this article, the term of office of Representatives shall be four years.

"SEC. 2. The Representatives shall be divided by lot into two classes. The number of offices assigned to each class shall be as nearly equal as may be; and the number of offices from each State assigned to each class shall be as nearly equal as may be.

"SEC. 3. The first division into classes shall be made immediately after the House of Representatives shall be assembled in consequence of the first election of Representatives to whom this article applies.

"A further division into the two classes shall be made immediately after the House of Representatives shall be assembled in consequence of each election of Members which next follows a reapportionment of Representatives among the several States. Such further division shall apply only to those States the representation of which has been increased or decreased by such reapportionment. The term of office of all Representatives from such States shall end at noon on the third day of January after the election which next follows such reapportionment.

"The offices of the Representatives from any newly admitted State shall be divided into the two classes immediately after the House of Representatives shall be assembled in consequence of the first election of Representatives from such State.

"SEC. 4. In order that, as nearly as may be, one-half of the Representatives will be chosen every two years, the term of office of those Representatives whose offices are assigned to the first class at the first division shall be two years, and the term of office of any Representative whose office is assigned to one of the two classes at any subsequent division shall expire at the same time as the term of office of the other offices assigned to that class.

"SEC. 5. The first sentence of section 2 of article I of the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 6. The foregoing provisions of this article shall first apply in the case of Representatives elected for terms beginning on the first January 3 which occurs more than one year after the ratification of this article.

"SEC. 7. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

USE OF SURPLUS FOOD FOR PEACE

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I think the message from the President, which has been laid before the Senate, is with respect to an agricultural program. One of the very important measures recommended in that message is the use of food as an instrument for peace. I think it is an extremely important program. I think it is a vital program, and one to which we should give our very careful attention.

I introduce a joint resolution touching the proposal of the President, expressing the concurrence of the views of the Congress on the use of surplus food as an instrument of peace, and ask that the joint resolution be appropriately referred.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in full at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred and, without objection, will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 37) to permit the use of food for peace, introduced by Mr. HICKENLOOPER, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress hereby concurs in the views of the President to the effect that food can be a powerful instrument for all the free world in building a durable peace and that the United States and other surplus-producing nations should make the fullest constructive use of their abundance of agricultural products to this end.

SEC. 2. The President is requested to review existing authorizations with respect to the disposal of agricultural commodities and products thereof, to utilize such authority to the fullest extent practicable in the interest of reinforcing peace and the well-being of friendly peoples throughout the world, and to report to the Congress such additional authorizations as he may consider desirable to achieve such purpose.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO TEMPORARY VACANCIES IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference a joint resolution to amend the Constitution to authorize Governors to fill temporary vacancies in the House of Representatives. Any time the House of Representatives is reduced by more than half, this bill would provide for the executive authority of each State to fill the vacancy through temporary appointment. Congressman EMANUEL CELLER has already reintroduced a similar resolution in the House, House Joint Resolution 8. During the 84th Congress this resolution was passed by the Senate, but during the last Congress it failed to get out of committee.

In these times of missiles, hydrogen bombs, and satellites I think this resolution has added importance. We ought to make sure of the continuation of the Congress should some emergency come to our country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 39) to amend the Constitution to authorize Governors to fill temporary vacancies in the House of Representatives, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION RELATING TO DISCHARGE OF PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to cases where the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office.

The joint resolution provides for assumption of the President's duties by the Vice President with written approval of a majority of the heads of executive departments.

It further provides that the Vice President can, if he and a majority of these department heads decide that the President's disability has not terminated, so declare to Congress and call upon Congress to consider the issue.

It further provides that Congress, through a two-thirds concurrent resolution, can agree to the Vice President continuing discharge of the President's duties until the Vice President or the Congress determines the President's inability has ended, or until the President's term ends.

This joint resolution is identical with Senate Joint Resolution 161 which I introduced last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 40) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to cases where the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROGRAM OF TAX ADJUSTMENT FOR SMALL BUSINESS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] be added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 59) to provide a program of tax adjustment for small business and for persons engaged in small business, introduced by me (for myself and other Senators), on January 9, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EFFECTIVE REGULATION OF D.C. TRANSIT SYSTEM, INC.—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the next reprinting of the bill (S. 304) to insure effective regulation of D.C. Transit System, Inc., and fair and equal competition between D.C. Transit System, Inc., and its competitors, introduced by me (for myself and other Senators) on January 14, 1959, the name of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] may be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF FLOOD CONTROL ACT OF 1950, RELATING TO LIBBY DAM—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the name of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] included as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 682) to amend the Flood Control Act of 1950 as it applies to the Libby Dam on the Kootenai River in the State of Montana.

The construction of the authorized multipurpose project, Libby Dam, has been held up for many years by international negotiations between the United States and Canada. This bill would authorize the construction of this project on a two-stage basis so that work can be started before an international agreement is arrived at. I am especially pleased to have the senior Senator from Vermont as cosponsor of S. 682 because of his intense interest in promoting Canadian-American relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, on January 23 the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the chairman of the Committee on Government Operations, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], and the very able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], introduced a bill (S. 676) to create a Department of Science and Technology. A similar bill was introduced last year.

It is my privilege to join as a cosponsor of this proposal, for I am firmly convinced it deals with a matter of tremendous importance to the future of our Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, it has been said many times that the memory of man is short; that matters of great public interest or concern today are forgotten tomorrow or next week. Sometimes public forgetfulness is good, sometimes it is not. All of us recall vividly the public concern and hubbub last session over the Russian sputnik and other scientific advancements made by the Communists. One result of that concern was congressional passage of the National Defense Education Act, a bill which made a good start in the right direction, but by no means completed the job. Formation of the new agency, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, to deal with the problem of space research and exploration, also was a constructive step, but it was only a start.

One of the leading authorities on the subject is Mr. Alan T. Waterman, the Director of the National Science Foundation. In his annual statement, the Director said, "the answer is that we have made only a beginning; the major job is still to be done."

Most of us must surely agree that the major job is still to be done and I am referring to our job, as well as the scientific work and training. Creation of a Department of Science and Technology is a vital part of the overall scientific research and development program. We should not forget the first shock of Russia's sputnik success, and leave a half-finished legislative program to do a half-coordinated job in this critical field.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts from the statement of Alan T. Waterman, Director of the National Science Foundation published in the Foundation's Eighth Annual Report, 1958, under the heading, "Director's Statement."

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

Are we as a nation proceeding forthrightly to accomplish what is necessary for maximum progress in science and technology, and for the improvement in the education and training of our young people? Furthermore, are we acting with the promptness which the situation demands? Or is there evidence that, as a rebound from our intense interest of a year ago, we are in danger of again becoming complacent? As a single illustration, one need only compare the reaction of the public to the launching of the first sputnik with that manifested at the third launching in May.

The answer is that we have only made a beginning; the major job is still to be done. In the field of education, there seems to be no immediate prospect of adequate salaries for schoolteachers, of adequate school buildings and facilities, nor of adequate incentives for recruiting the numbers of competent teachers we shall require. Congress shows caution about taking action, as do most of the States; the scientific and educational societies lack funds; and local attempts outside of a few wealthy suburban communities have come up against the realization that adequate funds are not available for the purpose until something is done about taxes.

As for the support of scientific research, it is generally recognized that the modern dependence of a country upon its technology requires thorough attention to its progress in science. The key to the latter lies in the support of basic research. Forward thinking and plans for dealing with important areas of research have not as yet shown indication of full realization in budget terms. The immediacy here lies in insuring the health and strength of science and engineering in the graduate schools of our colleges and universities, which constitute the stronghold for basic research and for the advanced training of scientists and engineers. The pressing problem for science and engineering in universities is to secure modern laboratories and research equipment, including rather costly equipment for the larger institutions, and to provide for large capital research facilities to be used nationally or at regional centers. In the interest of training future scientists, needs extend to undergraduate laboratories and demonstration equipment. Not to be forgotten are the fundamental needs of our colleges and universities for funds freely usable for maintenance and operation; these are the most difficult of all to secure.

In the meantime, the evidence from other countries and notably the U.S.S.R. shows a determination and a national spirit on the part of the people which seems to be relatively absent from the American scene. The recent educational group which went to the U.S.S.R. with the Commissioner of Education, and likewise the group of university presidents, came away with the conviction that the Russian people see their way clear to world leadership in science and technology. They are apparently dedicated to this—not in the sense of military competition, but rather of achieving world supremacy without the need of military domination. Among other nations, we shall ultimately have to reckon with the genius for organization and the industry of the German people, the industry and learning ability of the Japanese and the industry and potentialities of the Chinese.

As a Nation we appear to forget that we live in a competitive world and shall continue to do so. It seems abundantly clear that we shall rapidly lose in competition, unless we can show more determined and constructive efforts than we have during the past years.

It is clear that success in the requisite effort depends fundamentally upon the understanding of the problem by our people and our determination to achieve these goals. Under our democratic system, no segment of Government, whether Federal, State, or local, can succeed in securing necessary action programs or funds to carry them out unless our citizens understand, actively endorse, and indeed participate in the steps that need to be taken. In short, the wholehearted cooperation of the people of the country is necessary to achieve the goals which the President has pointed out so clearly. Most important here is a realization that this is not a single emergency but a continuing, possibly a permanent, one. In this modern world there can be no relaxation of a determination to compete successfully and continuously.

Admittedly, these questions are complicated by several issues: (a) The need and extent to which the Federal Government should take action and provide funds for education and for educational institutions in the face of a traditional policy of leaving such matters to State and local authorities; (b) the development of our full capabilities for national security and world competition without jeopardizing our economy; (c) the realization of national goals while maintaining individual initiative and achievement of individual wants and ambitions; (d) attainment of full development of individual talents and aptitudes while dealing satisfactorily with the demands for education for all.

While these questions are important and should be resolved, we dare not allow these to becloud the main issue—we must progress in our science and technology and in the education and training of our citizens with all the effectiveness and thoroughness we can muster. We cannot afford to delay in arguments as to how we do them.

During the past year the recession has brought us face to face with one of our most serious difficulties, namely, how we can develop our full capabilities and still remain financially solvent—in other words, how to provide for the increasingly costly technological developments necessary for national security without endangering the Nation's economy. A grave danger here is that, for reasons of economy, we fall short of developing our capabilities in science and technology.

We can only insure the possibility of full protection of national security by giving every encouragement to scientific research (as contrasted with development and production). It is only in this way that we can achieve the ideas and the breakthroughs which promise clear superiority; it is only in this way we can insure that the developments we undertake are modern and up-to-date in every detail. The results of such research, in competent hands, are never without value. Even when no breakthroughs appear, the total effort always brings a possible breakthrough closer.

It should be noted that the costs of research are very small as compared with those of development. Only about 4 percent of national funds for research and development go into basic research.

As history amply records, the most epoch-making scientific discoveries have come from basic research. But basic research, being exploration into the unknown by its very nature cannot predict exactly where these breakthroughs will occur. Therefore, comprehensive support of research has to be undertaken in order to overlook no opportunities. This should be regarded as an investment, the precise spots where high returns occur being unknown in advance. With full support of research, both basic and applied, we then have full exploitation of the potentialities for development and production. Incidentally, by the support of basic research we gain as an important by-product the advanced training of young scientists.

Whether our primary objective as a nation is to deter our enemies, to sustain the free world's leadership, to extend a helping hand to underdeveloped nations or merely to maintain our peace and prosperity at home, the first essential is a real determination to achieve better education, better science and technology and, above all, the development of quality in all fields—quality in training and quality in performance. Unless we can succeed in accomplishing these things we can maintain neither our national objectives nor the personal objectives of our people.

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1959—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the civil rights bill, Senate bill 810, introduced earlier in the day by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] for himself and other Senators be held at the desk until the close of business on Monday, February 2, to permit the addition of the names of other cosponsors, if additional Senators wish to become cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the majority leader that the Vice President has laid before the Senate names for assignment to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. If it is agreeable, I should like to have those names laid before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is perfectly agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy the following Senators, under title 42, U.S.C. 2251: Senators WALLACE F. BENNETT and GEORGE D. AIKEN, as minority members.

AUTHORIZATION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SPACE AND ASTRONAUTICS TO FILE REPORT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Special Committee on Space and Astronautics have until February 28, 1959, to file its report with the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD.

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. SPARKMAN:

Address entitled "Federal-City Relations Vital to Whole National Economy," delivered by Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK, and published in the Alabama Municipal Journal for January 1959.

By Mr. MURRAY:

Article entitled "Agency Works on New Plan To Spur School Building," written by James A. Reynolds, and published in the Wall Street Journal of January 22, 1959; press release by Senator MURRAY of January 22, 1959.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE DEALING WITH AGRICULTURE—NOTICE OF HEARING

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, a few minutes ago the Vice President laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States dealing with the problems facing the Nation's agricultural economy. I wish to give notice that at the next regular meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on Wednesday, February 4, 1959, I intend to try to have Mr. Benson, the Secretary of Agriculture, elaborate on these proposals which have been sent to the Congress by the President.

However, I would be less than fair if I did not state my opinion of the President's message at this time. Based upon the cursory examination I have been able to give the President's message since I received a copy this morning, I do not think there is a ghost of a chance for passage by this Congress of any legislation based on these recommendations.

By and large, I do not see that the President's message contains anything new. It is the same old story that we have heard over the past number of years—the same old demands that the Secretary of Agriculture be given even greater freedom to drive down the prices received by farmers for their products. The President is now seeking legislation which would allow the Secretary of Agriculture to fix price supports anywhere within a range of 75 to 90 percent of the average market price received by farmers during the immediate preceding years. If Congress refuses to go along with this idea, then he wants the power to fix support prices at a range from 0 to 90 percent of parity.

Both the President and the Secretary of Agriculture should know that last year those same proposals were presented to the Senate. After extensive hearings on those proposals, the Congress passed a different bill, one which I was led to understand was agreeable to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the President, since the President signed the bill.

Today we are confronted with another suggestion, namely, that we wipe out all we did last year and make the Secretary of Agriculture almost a complete czar by giving him complete control over price supports with respect to our various basic commodities. Personally, I do not believe that either the Senate or the House will stand for such a procedure.

Specifically, Secretary Benson is recommending, in this message we have received today, through the President, changes in the wheat program similar to those enacted for corn last year, on the one hand, or stricter acreage controls on the other.

Both approaches suggested by the Secretary would result in both lower prices and lower incomes to farmers. Neither would provide any stability to the farmer's economic position.

Rather, wheat farmers, for example, would be subjected to increased hazards of continued overproduction and lower prices.

There is no doubt that something must be done to solve the pressing wheat problem. However, I think that the committee should look at all plans which have been proposed, both by farm organizations and individuals, before accepting any of the Secretary's proposals.

The recommendations for tobacco and peanuts consist primarily of lower prices in both cases.

In my judgment, none of these recommendations would solve any of the problems which face wheat, tobacco, and peanuts, or any other commodity for that matter. In fact, I submit that, if followed, these recommendations would further aggravate the situation. However, I wish to be fair with the Secretary, as well as with the President. I give them the assurance that any bill they may draft and send to the Senate Agriculture Committee will be considered. What is more, I also give them the assurance that the Senate Agriculture Commitee will do all in its power to completely study any proposed farm legislation. We shall do this so that all facets of the problems which now face our farmers can readily be seen. I also pledge to the Secretary and President that any legislation which comes before the Senate Agriculture Committee will receive fair and impartial treatment.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR EDUCATION BY THE EDUCATION SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, for the information of Senators and other interested parties, I wish to announce that beginning Wednesday, February 4, the Education Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will conduct hearings on legislation authorizing Federal support for education.

Hearings will be conducted in the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee room in the New Senate Office Building, February 4, 5, and 6, beginning at 10 o'clock each day.

The witness on the first day, February 4, will be Miss Ruth Stout, of Kansas, president of the National Education Association. On Thursday, February 5, we will take testimony from Dr. Walter Heller, chairman of the Department of economics at the University of Minnesota. On Friday, February 6, we will hear Dr. William Alexander, of Peabody College, and Mrs. Betty Lou Pagel, a classroom teacher from Cheyenne, Wyo. Dr. Alexander is president-elect of the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development.

Following the hearings next week the subcommittee plans to resume consideration of this proposed legislation during the week of February 22.

I hereby invite Senators and other interested parties who wish to appear or submit statements to notify the chief clerk of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

UNITED STATES MUST "HARDEN ITS MUSCLES" TO MEET SOVIET CHALLENGE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as we know, the 21st Congress of the Soviet Communist Party is now meeting in Moscow.

The Communist Congress is, of course, a far cry from a Congressional session in this country. Nevertheless, it is a significant meeting, if only in terms of possibly warning us what the Soviets may be up to in the years ahead.

Rather than being a representative process, the Party Congress in Moscow can more properly be defined as a dictatorial parley in which the underlings receive, and approve, a report from the party bosses, in this case, Khrushchev. In addition, they laud past achievements, and docilely accept the multiyear plans laid down for the future.

During the meeting, we shall no doubt continue to hear loud proclamations about Soviet achievements and goals for the future. We can expect, of course, that facts will be diluted with propaganda, and promises will exceed ability to deliver.

Nevertheless, Soviet progress must be viewed realistically. In recent years, the Soviets have made forward strides in weapons, missiles and satellites, atomic energy, education, engineering, agriculture, and other fields.

For the future, we can expect them to be a challenge to us in practically every category of endeavor.

Can we meet the challenge? Yes. I have every confidence that we shall do so successfully.

However, resting on our laurels will not do the job. As a nation, we must harden our muscles for the battle ahead, not just for this year or next year, but far into the future.

In meeting the challenge, of course, we must not sacrifice any of our basic freedoms. We must, however, be dedicated and willing to exert time, energy, and brain-and-muscle power to support dynamic programs in every field.

NEUTRAL NATIONS ARE WATCHING

We recognize, of course, that the so-called neutral nations are watching us. They are looking for an example by which to set their own standards for the future. Will it be our free way of life? Or will it be communism?

They, too, are asking the question: Can a free nation maintain world leadership as well as top place in productivity in scientific achievement, and yet remain free?

Of course, I firmly believe that we can, and will, meet all challenges.

Nevertheless, let us not have any illusions. Victory—economic, ideologic, scientific, or military—will not come automatically or magically.

Instead, the future of the Nation depends upon our willingness sometimes to sacrifice luxuries for necessities, to be realistic, hard-working, and dedicated. This is no child's game. To the contrary, our survival is at stake. A great many decisions by this Congress will, of course, be a determining factor in our security.

In planning for defense, we recognize more and more that the key to an effective defense—scientifically and militarily—will not necessarily be volume of weapons. Rather, our safety will depend upon the availability of the right kind of weapons at the right time.

In this age, almost continuous discoveries often make relatively new weapons obsolete—sometimes overnight. Thus, we must aim for balance in our defense program, as well as in the domestic economy, rather than for a series of crash programs.

In planning for the future, however, we need to set our goals—not exclusively in terms of the threat to our security posed by communism—but, of even more importance, in accordance with our traditionally high standards and ideals of advancing progress and achievement. If we do this with a Spartan's spirit—and do not become lazy and complacent, taking for granted our way of life—this, in itself, will go a long way toward meeting the challenges of the future, and toward avoiding our losing the freedom versus enslavement of communism contest that will mark the years ahead.

IMPORTANCE OF THE RAILROADS

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, in yesterday's edition of the Washington Post there appeared an interesting and rather significant editorial commenting on a recent advertisement by one of our great western railroads.

The advertisement was in the nature of a congratulatory message to American Airlines, following inauguration of its coast-to-coast jet service. The Santa Fe Railroad pointed out that flying is fine for people in a rush, but rail travel is better for those who want to see the country.

I believe this is a refreshing and constructive point of view, demonstrating, as it does, a recognition of the important contributions which both the airlines and the railroads make today.

I was further reminded of this situation on Tuesday of this week, Mr. President, when two of my constituents were planning to come to Washington, from Delaware, for a rather important appointment at one of the Federal departments. They had planned to fly to Washington, but as the weather became unfavorable during the late morning hours, flight plans were canceled. Fortunately, however, they were able to catch one of our Pennsylvania Railroad trains, to arrive in time for the conference. On their arrival at Union Station, someone was heard to observe, "Well, it is a good thing the trains are running."

And so it is, because in spite of our great progress and advances in air transportation—which we, of course, welcome—there remains the imperative necessity to encourage a continuation of our railroad systems, which have done so much to further the Nation's welfare. And, as they carry the freight, mail, and thousands of passengers in rain or shine, the railroads do, as the Santa Fe line pointed out, enable Americans to see their country at the same time.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the complete editorial to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 28, 1959]

BROAD-GAGED

There's hope for the sagging railroad passenger business yet if the imagination displayed in a Santa Fe System advertisement the other day is any criterion. "Happy landing, amigo," said the Santa Fe in a toast to the newly inaugurated transcontinental jet service of American Airlines. Flying is fine for people in a rush, rail travel better for those who want to "see the country," said the railroad. This is a refreshing departure from the sly implications in some railroad advertising that delay or disaster awaits the air traveler. Moreover it bespeaks a welcome intention on the part of the railroad to stress and improve upon the unique advantages of rail travel. Many railroads simply fail to recognize these advantages and make the most of them—even omitting such obvious steps as keeping the coach windows clean and insisting upon courteous treatment for passengers. The best thing about the Santa Fe's broad-gaged appeal, however, is that it looks at the transportation industry whole. If the many ills that afflict trucking, railroading, and air transport are to be solved, more companies in each of these fields will have to take the same kind of approach.

THIRD NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON EXCHANGE OF PERSONS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of all the Members of Congress the fact that hundreds of citizens from all parts of the United States are now assembled in the Mayflower Hotel to participate in the Third National Conference on Exchange of Persons. This significant meeting, which brings together men and women from private organizations, institutions, and civic groups, as well as key representatives of Government, was organized by the Institute of International Education in cooperation with 139 private and public national agencies. The roster of these cooperating groups, which I should like to read into the RECORD, is abundant and encouraging evidence of how many of our citizens are concerned with building better understanding among nations through intelligent and constructive programs for the exchange of people.

The theme of the conference is "World Progress Through Educational Exchange." It is particularly appropriate that such a conference should be held in Washington at this time. In the United States, unlike the practice in most other countries, sponsorship of exchange with foreign countries of scholars, technicians, and leaders has historically been the responsibility of private groups—foundations, colleges and universities, corporations, service clubs, religious groups, and individual philanthropists. It was only 20 years ago that the U.S. Government officially recognized that a program of cultural relations with other nations could contribute to our foreign policy.

It was 11 years ago that the Smith-Mundt Act was passed; and it provided for the first time for an established, official government program carrying this exchange program throughout the world and providing for American participation and for the use of funds of the American Government.

Among the important problems which the IIE Conference will face are: a frank assessment of the present limited activities of the U.S. Government in this vital field; an evaluation of the impact of governmental activity on private initiative; and a projection of what public and private groups together can and should do in the future. These, to me, are questions which merit the consideration of all Members of the Congress.

I emphasize that no Government funds have been used to convene this meeting. It is also important to note that all these people, including the speakers, have paid their own expenses to the conference.

I am pleased to note that both the President and Vice President of the United States will participate in the conference. It is also significant that at least 10 Members of the Congress, from both sides of both Houses, will be active in the plenary sessions and workshops. We, with representatives of the executive branch, should gain much from these discussions.

The heart of participation in the meeting, as well as in the development of effective cultural, educational, and technical international exchange programs, is the private citizen of the United States. The names and fields of work of the men and women who will be conferring in Washington these next 4 days are most impressive. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt will be a member of one important panel. From business and labor are such men as William R. Herod, president of International General Electric; Monroe Spaght, executive vice president of Shell; William Foster of Olin-Mathieson Chemical Corp.; Michael Rose and Victor Reuther of the AFL–CIO. It is interesting to note that the International Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners is one of the organizations which joined with philanthropic foundations in making the conference possible.

The program includes, for example, the presidents of Columbia University, Princeton University, the University of Pittsburgh, Hunter College, the University of Minnesota, the University of Florida, and the president emeritus of the University of California. From professional fields come such men in law as Arthur Dean of Sullivan & Cromwell; Robert Storey, of Texas, former president of the American Bar Association. From medicine, Dr. Howard Rusk of the Bellevue Medical Center. From communications media, Edward R. Murrow of CBS; Robert Saudek, producer of "Omnibus"; Sterling Fisher of Readers Digest; Ernest K. Lindley of Newsweek; Herbert Matthews of the New York Times; and Lauren Soth of the Des Moines Register & Tribune. From the field of art will come Martha Graham, Blanche Thebom, Lamar Dodd, and William Schuman, to mention only a few.

To this list one must add civic leaders from cities and towns stretching from California to New York and from Minnesota to Louisiana.

On Friday evening at the dinner to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Institute of International Education, Vice President NIXON will present five IIE awards for distinguished service to a U.S. college or university; a U.S. corporation; a U.S. private organization; a U.S. community, and a U.S. citizen. These awards are in recognition of outstanding contributions to the development of international understanding through creative and practical support of educational, cultural, and technical exchange programs.

I know that all Members of the Congress have been invited to the meetings, and I hope that many of us will attend.

Kenneth Holland, president of the Institute of International Education, in convening the meeting, said:

> We have a unique opportunity to consider, evaluate, and forecast the exchange of persons program. It is our fervent hope that these few days spent together will result in improved exchange programs which will spread knowledge and develop greater understanding among the nations of the world and also contribute to the lowering of tensions.
> Exchanging persons between the Western and Communist blocs is far less dangerous than exchanging intercontinental rockets. Guided tours do less damage than guided missiles. This is not a summit conference. It is an educational one, and I am convinced that education of enough people across national boundaries may one day permit men and women everywhere to rise to the summit of their creative abilities. Then men could truly become the image of God recognized by all great religions, and peace might reign forever and ever.

Mr. President, the names of the organizations attending the conference are contained in a program, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HATE CAMPAIGN

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, there has recently been concluded in the New York Daily News a series of five articles by David Burk on a hate campaign being waged against groups of United States citizens and the fundamental fair play distinguishing our country. I refer to the campaign of hate against not only racial and religious minorities but also against those who venture to voice opinions tolerant of these groups.

The Burk series in the News, "Peddling Hate in America: Egypt's Nasser," endeavors to reveal the support, both overt and subvert, given to extremist hate groups in the United States by agents of the United Arab Republic and other fanatical Arab interests.

I am also bringing this series of articles to the attention of the Departments of Justice and State to ascertain whether there have been any violations of the Foreign Agents Registration Act, the Corrupt Practices Act, or diplomatic protocol, and also to determine whether any further legislation is necessary, in the opinion of these departments, to strengthen our defenses against such activities as are alleged in the article series.

On January 9 I introduced, together with eight of my colleagues, S. 122 "to make unlawful mailing of matter tending to incite crimes of violence," and S. 125 "to authorize the exclusion from the mails of matter relating to the solicitation of funds for, and the distribution of information relating to, certain unlawful activities." It is my intention also to push for early consideration of these measures vital to curbing the hate campaign so ably chronicled by Mr. Burk in the News.

Mr. Burk is obviously very careful about his facts, and therefore is not pointing an accusing finger or indicting anyone but is merely making a report as a thorough and hardworking reporter. What he does show, however, is a climate of activity by foreign agencies in this country and the implications which it could have which should serve as a danger signal to us as well as to responsible elements in these foreign countries themselves. We should not be quick to jump at conclusions in respect to the facts disclosed, but we should also consider them most carefully in respect to our national interest.

Mr. President, on Tuesday, January 27th, I sought to have this series of articles published in the New York Daily News printed in the RECORD, but due to technical aspects of my request, they were not inserted in the RECORD.

I now ask unanimous consent that the articles be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEDDLING HATE IN AMERICA: EGYPT'S NASSER—THE LUNATIC FRINGE HANGS RAVINGS ON THE CAIRO LINE

(By David Burk)

(First article of a series)

Nearly 90 dynamite blasts have echoed around the country in the last two years, aimed mainly at Jews, Negroes and sincere Christian citizens who have publicly backed these groups. FBI and internal security agents had long been on the bombers' trail, but when a $100,000 gash was torn in the Jewish Temple at Atlanta, Ga., last October a grim and startling fact leaked out for the first time.

Practically every operation fitted into a national pattern which, authorities believe, was etched by a loose-linked network of American neo-Fascist groups peppered around the country.

This hate corps, smashed in the 40s when it openly supported Hitler while other Americans fought him on the battlefields, today has emerged as a fifth column acting in behalf of President Gamal Abdel Nasser of the so-called United Arab Republic and his dreams of empire.

FASCISTS DEMAND AN AMERICAN HITLER

Since mid-October, in New York and other States, I have been seeking out the men and the groups tailored into the network of hate and violence, listening to their boasts and threats and admissions, reading their printed ravings, checking on their connections. I have compared my findings with the officials whose job it is to fit the confused jigsaw puzzle together.

In the process, aspects of this conspiracy that at first seemed wildly inconsistent or bordering on fantasy gradually fell into line and made sense.

The Fascists, many of whom still strut at closed gatherings in facsimiles of the Nazi Brownshirt uniform, spew out hysterical propaganda against America's Government and institutions and openly urge their replacement with a Hitler (or Khrushchev) style corporate state.

What at first appears to be only misplaced or demented idealism turns out on closer examination to be surreptitious big business. In some cases, the annual turnover runs well into six figures.

The men behind this hate racket revere Adolf Hitler. One of them, a ruggedly handsome, Fuehrer-minded Virginian named George Lincoln Rockwell, whose name has been linked with the men on trial for the Atlanta bombing, expressed the general idea for all his fellows when he told me:

"Adolf Hitler was a gift from an inscrutable Providence. He was a world savior in his time."

But the worship of dead and departed heroes is of dwindling popular appeal. So, while not toppling the late, overambitious house painter from his pedestal, the racists cast around for a new and living counterpart.

The man they chose, ironically enough, was Nasser—and business has been brisk ever since. Cairo, since Nasser's hop, skip, and jump into power in 1952, has been a trail blazer in the sphere of inflammatory propaganda, as the heads of other Arab States repeatedly complain.

The constant exchange of gimmicks, vituperation and Moscow-style distortions—as well, it is believed, as sackfuls of shekels—suggests that both Cairo and America's lunatic fringe welcome an occasional shot in the arm.

The race groups here, coordinated rather than organized and with a total following throughout the country that officials estimate at not more than a few thousand, are zealously following Nasser's line.

But what, you may ask, could Nasser possibly want with a fifth column in the United States? The answer, as officials at the Department of Justice explained it to me, is transparently simple.

ARABS REGARD UNITED STATES AS "SECOND FRONT"

The Nasser-dominated segment of the Arab world, fed on an information diet prescribed by our native racists, frankly regards not only American Jewry but the U.S. administration, too, as the fountainhead of Israel's moral and financial help. Looked at in this light, Nasser must knock out Israel's backers in the United States before he can keep his pledge to his followers to knock out Israel itself. The United States thus becomes a legitimate "second front."

Nasser, himself, back in the early fifties when he still was the unassuming Colonel Nasser, Eyptian Prime Minister under fatherly Gen. Mohammed Naguib, whom he later liquidated as subtly as any trained Kremlinite, once told me bitterly in Cairo.

"America is in the hands of the Zionists. The Jews control the press and Government. The Arab voice is never heard. How can we fight back?"

For at least 4 years now he has been fighting back, using Egyptian military intelligence officers and men who can hide behind diplomatic immunity as the contact men, and a group of individuals and periodicals as his mouthpieces. The periodicals, all neatly arranged in alphabetical order on the Attorney General's list of subversive publications, rarely go to press without some item of Nasser's propaganda, and their own outpourings turn up in Arab press and broadcasts.

HOPE TO BREED HATRED AT JEWS

The basic hope is that, by breeding hatred and suspicion of the Jews, outraged public opinion might force Congress to stop official support for Israel. With a little additional shove, Congress might even be persuaded to legislate against support for Israel from Jewish organizations.

Since Nasser has such ranking experts on his staff as Kurt von Reimer, who learned his racism under the able Dr. Goebbels, the American pure-blood operators have had little difficulty in surmounting the paradox that Egypt is an African country whose people have combined Negro and semitic blood.

The master-race philosophy, in its amended form, has dropped the label "anti-Semite" like a hot coal so that, as one of the American fuehrers put it, "common ground and common cause" with the Arabs could be found. In its place was installed the blunter anti-Jew.

The anti-Negro gambit, however, had to stay because the racists, though mainly headquartered north of the Mason-Dixon Line, made considerable capital by operating a king-size bandwagon for southern hotheads.

Nasser's boys, moreover, do not regard their American allies as odd bedfellows. Totalitarianism is a process that traditionally creates unlikely relationships and Nasser's far-flung activities—zig-zagging between Communist Russia and the West—indicate that he never has much minded with whom he jumped into bed.

In a blustery campaign which currently is losing some of its original impetus, Nasser has been blasting the native Communists of Egypt and his northern province of Syria, as well as those of Iraq. The word "Communists" has to go between quotation marks because the definition, so far, is a Nasser exclusive. There is no guarantee but Nasser's own that the hundreds of persons he has had thrown into clink are the Communists in fact—and the record offers no evidence that Nasser's guarantees are of any value.

Deceit and the false-front are gimmicks as popular in Cairo as they are in Moscow. The Egyptian dictator's real problem is the renewed rivalry from his opposite number in Iraq, Gen. Abdul Karim el-Kassem. Iraqi rivalry has worried Nasser before. Every time he feels he is making headway with his plan to create an Arab empire, Iraq gets in the way. Last time, the competitor was pro-Western Premier Nuri Said, the only statesman worthy of the title in the Mid-East. Sparked by Nasser's agents, el-Kassem and some army cohorts bumped off Said and his friends last July in a bloody uprising.

ATLANTA BOMBING SPOTLIGHTED PLOT

But Moscow was backing both Nasser and el-Kassem, and still is. And it evidently suits Khrushchev to use the Iraqi in an effort to reduce the swelling of the Egyptian's head. So the real issue today is not one of Nasser against the Reds (latest reports from Iraq say Kassem also is swinging against the Communists) but of an internal Arab fight for power. Both sides feel that Western support, especially financial, might help. And what better way of suckering the West than to put on a great Red roundup rodeo, which also provides an opportunity of locking up anyone whose loyalty to the dictatorship is doubtful?

The Atlanta temple bombing, however, triggered a series of shocks. First, it was thoroughly condemned by every respectable and responsible citizen, from President Eisenhower on down. Second, thanks to a story carried exclusively in the News, the link between the Arabs and the hatemongers held responsible for the blast suddenly emerged. Third, it was revealed that the FBI, the Nation's top counterespionage outfit, had been ordered into action instead, as in previous bombings, of investigations being left to the city or State police.

For various reasons, some obvious, Cairo cannot afford to be caught out. The State Department would be pretty mad, of course, but it would be much worse if word leaked out in Egypt that Nasser's agents were playing footsie with setups that are not merely anti-Jewish but also anti-Negro.

At the New York information office maintained by the Arab League, but largely dominated by Nasser at the UAR delegation to the United Nations and at the UAR Embassy in Washington, a firm front was maintained against "these undesirable elements." The order had gone out: "Deny, deny, deny."

The hatemongers I sought out have been less discreet. The connection with an established regime is too good for their egos to be hidden. Men like James H. Madole, the basilisk-eyed, stiff-jointed leader of Manhattan's National Renaissance Party, boasted of meeting regularly with the Arabs.

Prudgy-faced, mezzo soprano Harold N. Arrowsmith, admitted "fat cat" (financier) of some of the activities of the Atlanta States rights gang, five of whom are currently on trial for the bombing, assured me in Baltimore, Md., that his counsel is much in demand not only by the Arabs, but also by the FBI and the State Department.

BOASTED OF VISIT BY NASSER SPY

Arrowsmith's protege, George Lincoln Rockwell, who master minded States Rights Party demonstrations in Atlanta and Washington last July under his own banner, the National Committee To Free America From Jewish Domination, told me in Arlington, Va., that Arrowsmith had brought the head of Nasser's secret service to see him.

The Baltimore oracle later told me this was "a damned lie" and he is probably right. The chances of Arrowsmith dealing with anyone as exalted as Nasser's secret service boss seem pretty remote.

Even the Egyptians are apt to break down under stress. During a long talk one night in Washington with an official of the UAR Embassy, I was repeatedly assured that not only would no one from his government have dealings with "these scum"; they would kick them out bodily if they dared to cross the Embassy's threshold.

But finally he raised his hands shoulder high in extreme exasperation and snarled, "What can we do if these people want to help tell our story? Is that our fault?

"You know as well as I do that the Jews control your so-called free press here. Only the Zionists' voices are heard."

He might have been quoting straight from an American hate sheet, or from Cairo radio. They're pretty hard to tell apart.

PEDDLING HATE IN AMERICA: EGYPT'S NASSER—CAIRO TIE IS SEEN TO TEMPLE BOMB

(By David Burk)

(Second article of a series)

A few hours after the Atlanta, Ga., temple blast on last October 12, Cairo Radio, which is under the personal supervision of United Arab Republic President Gamal Abdel Nasser, went on the air with an item titled: "Americans, Not Arabs, Bomb Synagogues."

There is a mass of evidence of direct liaison between agents of the UAR and leaders of the American race groups held responsible for the bombing by United States authorities. But 5 days were to elapse before this fact was revealed in an exclusive story in the News and it is uncertain whether the title on that broadcast item was self-conscious or not.

Cairo Radio added: "It is reported from the United States that unknown persons have destroyed a synagogue in the city of Atlanta.

"It is further reported that publications throughout the Southern States are carrying hostile articles against the Jewish community."

The radio did not explain where that second statement originated. The publications, however, could only have been those put out by America's neo-Fascist groups whose activities identify them daily more closely as a Nasser fifth column in the United States.

Such hate sheets as Common Sense, published by Conde McGinley in Union City, N. J., and The Cross and the Flag, put out in Los Angeles by Gerald L. K. Smith, print a routine combination of pro-Nasser and anti-Jewish propaganda. These and other similar periodicals, most of which have been listed as subversive by the Attorney General, always flood into areas afflicted by racial incidents and violence.

Developments in Cairo that mid-October day grew more and more interesting.

The radio newsreader had barely gone off the air after his piece on the Atlanta bombing when further reports crowded over the international news wires. They told of the angry official and public reaction that had reverberated across the United States.

Especially disturbing was the news that the FBI had been ordered to investigate.

Cairo Radio did not mention the dynamiting again. And an Egyptian editor acquaintance here recently on a visit, told me that his and every other paper spiked the story of the bombing.

When the News ran its exclusive from Atlanta a few days later, asserting that the investigators' trail might lead from middle Georgia to the Middle East, a visible shudder went through Egyptian officials in the United States, even though Cairo was not then named.

One member of Egypt's diplomatic service was overheard to remark, with a lamentable lack of diplomacy: "This is awful. Someone must have been very stupid."

Manhattan's James H. Madole, one of several petty fuehrers who strut around the United States, produced an ingenious sidestep. At a meeting, held in the Nola Studios above Steinway Hall, 113 West 57th Street, he charged (and repeated in a leaflet at a modest 25 cents a copy) that Atlanta's Jews had blown up thier own synagogue.

CALLS REACTION ATTEMPT TO APPEASE JEWISH VOTE

Titled "The Untold Facts Behind the Synagogue Bombing," Madole said it "had set off a chain reaction from President Eisenhower * * * to five unemployed nationalists who are being legally crucified * * * to appease the Jewish vote. An unprecedented wave of publicity has swept the entire United States calling for the suppression of all 'hate literature'."

By "hate literature," Madole explained, he means, "any publication which has the temerity to criticize the un-American activities of the Jew and his multimillion-dollar propaganda agencies."

"Let us," Madole continued, "analyze the facts. Which group has gained more from the veritable epidemic of bombings and dynamitings culminating in the Atlanta explosion?"

The dynamitings in Clinton, Nashville, Jacksonville, Miami, and other Southern cities, Madole said, have been used by the Jewish press "to rally Catholic and Protestant clergy behind the fundamentally Jewish-sponsored drive for complete racial integration."

SAYS BOMB THREATS AIDED B'NAI B'RITH

Moreover, he added, reports of bomb threats and the wave of violence, bombings and hate literature around the country brought pledges of increased contributions to support the American-Jewish Committee and the B'nai B'rith.

"Quite obviously," said Madole, who stares as he talks, with wide eyes that never flicker and seem to be focused on outer space, "the Jews were the only group to gain, both financially and economically, from the dynamitings. No sane American nationalist could expect anything but the intervention of Federal authorities, a tidal wave of investigations, and unfavorable publicity in the national press."

However, laments the wild-eyed fuehrer, since Atlanta's Mayor William B. Hartsfield, Police Chief Herbert Jenkins and Prosecutor Paul Webb "are part of the Jewish fifth column in the Deep South * * * political traitors kept in power by the wealthy Jewish community * * * to open the door to racial integration," who can expect justice?

Another Madole leaflet lashes out at FBI Chief J. Edgar Hoover's book on communism in the United States, "Masters of Deceit." One of the top propaganda lines of the hate groups, alongside their plugging of the Nasser cause, is one developed by Goebbels in the thirties.

"Communism," goes the slogan, backed up by a grab bag of fractured history, sociology and other sciences, "is Jewish."

For defining this charge in his book as one of the most malicious myths that has developed in the United States, Hoover is fingered by Madole as America's foremost master of deceit who must be planning to retire soon and wants to assure either a good job in the business world or a nice fat ADL (Anti-Defamation League) check.

(For the record, rival fuehrer Lincoln Rockwell of Arlington, Va., on a separate occasion, singled Hoover out for praise for exposing Harry Truman as a liar when Truman promoted Jewish Communist spy Harry Dexter White in spite of a complete report from the FBI, then lied that the FBI had recommended the promotion.)

Madole, who periodically drops into burlesque-stage Jewish accents to wring a chuckle from his small audiences (of the 50 present November 14, Madole claimed many are Jews, secret agents, and reporters), then swung into his Arab routine.

"We must get together with the Arabs," he asserted. "We have a common cause. We are all anti-Jew. Nasser has sworn to get rid of all Egypt's Jews, but his policy hasn't succeeded yet. There are still 25,000 of them there.

"But it's only a matter of time. I see some of these Arabs regularly, and you can take that as a fact."

If anyone wanted fuller information on that subject, he said, there were some leaflets on the table at the back of the hall. There were indeed. Leaflets titled, "Murder, Rape, and Devastation" (by Israel in Gaza), "The Story of Zionist Espionage in Egypt," "Gamal Abdul Nasser," "Gaza Under the Zionist Heel," and others.

EGYPTIAN DIPLOMATS EXPRESS SURPRISE

They outnumbered the National Renaissance Party's own literature heavily. Each was rubber-stamped: "National Renaissance Party, 10 W. 90th Street, New York 24, N.Y.," on one side and: "Egyptian State Information Department, 22 Soliman Street, Cairo" on the other.

The Egyptian Embassy in Washington, and the Egyptian UN delegation headquarters and Arab Information Office in New York, all expresed surprise that their publications fall into such hands.

"Perhaps," suggested one helpful employee at the Arab Information Office, 120 East 56th Street, "they find one or two and then have them copied here."

The official, an Egyptian like all the top men in this office which purports to represent the nine-nation Arab League, thought the same answer might apply to Nasser boosts appearing in other racist publications around the country.

FAILS TO EXPLAIN EGYPTIAN REPRINTS

He could not explain, however, how articles published in American racist magazines and leaflets comes to be reprinted in Nasser-controlled newspapers or quoted on Nasser's radio stations.

In their anxiety to be all-embracing, to reach the hearthstones of American families of different tastes and viewpoints, the racist periodicals adopt a variety of fronts.

From California, Gerald L. K. Smith offers the Christian approach. From New Jersey, Conde McGinley tackles the Catholics.

Madole offers a combination that includes atheism and a party program that is "for a dictatorship in place of Jewish-controlled democracy," and will "solve all problems—social, economic, labor and juvenile delinquency." "Our slogan," he says, "is one nation, one race, one leader."

Charles Smith, under the auspices of whose New York Racist Forum Madole holds his indoor meetings, plies atheism, anti-Jew and anti-Negro theses, plus the offer of a free book catalogue listing such titles as, "Symbols, Sex and the Stars," "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," "Sex in Religion," "Short History of Sex Worship," and many others.

DON'T HATE NEGRO, JUST HIS "BAD SEED"

Smith's monthly Truth Seeker, "Oldest Freethought Paper in the World—a Journal for Reasoners and Racists," splashes its pages with groups of items like this: "White racists do not hate the colored man. It is the bad seed within him which they desire to eliminate. The race leveler is the hate preacher."

Another of the breed, New York's Benjamin H. Freedman, who has been playing footsie with the Arabs since the midforties, puts out a turgid broadsheet crammed with a mosaic of history, past and present. He is a renegade Jew.

Merwin K. Hart, who hangs a shingle proclaiming the National Economic Council, Inc. outside his office in the Empire State Building, makes his pitch in the sober language of a university lecturer and blandly lists on the back of his Economic Council letter the Arab periodicals which reprint his stuff.

Robert H. Williams, who calls himself major although the Army stripped him of the rank in 1950, pretended he was in U.S. intelligence during World War II for the benefit of those who like their hate diet served from the top-secret drawer.

HOUSE COMMITTEE CHARGED DECEPTION

The House Committee on Un-American Activities, in a report on "Neo-Fascist and Hate Groups" in December 1954, called the monthly Intelligence Summary Williams puts out from Santa Ana, Calif., a deception. (Williams recently went out of the publishing business, probably temporary.)

Far from being a high-powered innercircle man, the committee said, "Williams' intelligence duty comprised less than a year as an administrative officer for the intelligence section of a bomber wing." Thus, adds the report, "he would have received no intelligence information dealing with the Communist conspiracy."

Frank L. Britton, a disciple of Gerald L. K. Smith, thumps the ultra-nationalist, defend-America tub from California. Petulant historian Harold N. Arrowsmith, of Baltimore, Md., who describes himself as a financially self-sufficient researcher with a string of university degrees, burrows in history for political worms and comes up with various documents handy for quoting out of context.

There is even, lest a stone be left unturned, something for the man who wants to be anti-Jew, anti-Negro, and tolerant—all at once, a unique service provided by Lincoln Rockwell.

PEDDLING HATE IN AMERICA: EGYPT'S NASSER—IDEAS OF CAIRO AIDS, OUR RACISTS FIT LIKE A DAGGER AND A SHEATH

(By David Burk)

(Third of five articles)

Soon after the Atlanta temple bombing, Ambassador Kamil Abdel Rahim, suave, ambitious head of the Arab Information Office, was recalled to Cairo for consultations. Reliable reports say Rahim, who inspired and founded the Arab Information Office in early 1955, has been sacked.

The reports add that his job will probably be taken by a high-ranking officer of Nasser's army. Like the other Egyptian army officers attached to Nasser's United Nations delegation and embassy, the new man will wear civilian clothes and will be addressed as plain "Mr."

Rahim's recall at this time has sparked rumors that he is in hot water because the link between Cairo and America's anti-Negro, anti-Jew hate front had leaked out and come under active investigation by the FBI and the Internal Security Division of the Department of Justice.

These rumors may or may not be true. But this much is known:

Back in the early fifties, when Rahim was posted to Washington as Egyptian Ambassador, he and his senior aids were flattered by the attentions they received from some of the racist fanatics. An identity of viewpoint was found on several issues, especially regarding the creation of the State of Israel and its support by Jews in the United States.

RACIST EDITOR AT EMBASSY LUNCHEON

Gerald Winrod, who then edited a racist magazine called Defender, lunched with Rahim at the Embassy. Robert Williams, who pretends to readers of his Intelligence Summary that he got the whole inside dope on the Communist conspiracy as an intelligence officer in World War II, was in touch with Omar Haliq of the Saudi U.N. delegation, offering pamphlets and mailing lists.

Subscriptions were taken to such hate sheets as Gerald L. K. Smith's The Cross and the Flag. Jewish renegade Benjamin H. Freedman, who backs Conde McGinley's subversive Common Sense and plugged Haj Amin el-Husseini, former Mufti of Jerusalem and Hitler's wartime Arab voice, paid frequent court and still does.

Rahim saw the potential in all these individuals and their outlets.

Then, when he learned that the Arab Information Office, officially sponsored by all the Arab League States, would have to register with the Justice Department as the agent of a foreign power, Rahim quickly had himself transferred to the Yemen delegation to the U.N. to preserve his diplomatic immunity.

The Foreign Agents Registration Act, 1938, as amended, is specific. Any person or organization engaging in propaganda in behalf of a foreign power must send the Justice Department a half-yearly report listing its staff, activities, income, and expenses.

The Arab Information Office, which now has branches in Washington, Chicago, San Francisco, and Ottawa, opened its New York headquarters in March 1955.

BELIEVED TO HAVE $1 MILLION BUDGET

Conflicting statements by persons connected with the AIO and the various Arab States delegations to the U.N. has created some confusion over the size of the AIO budget. Rahim reportedly told diplomats when the office first opened that he had received an initial $400,000 and a further $300,000 later in the year.

The general impression in diplomatic circles is that the AIO annual budget hovers somewhere around $1 million. A conference of the Arab League executive early in 1958 was reported to have considered an appropriation of $1 million a year but there is no record that it was voted through.

In any case, the AIO return to the Foreign Agents' Registry at the Justice Department in Washington reports that it received $2,500 in December 1954, to set up its New York office. Receipts for its first year totaled $130,000 and expenses were about the same.

Today, with a much larger staff and five offices instead of one, income and expenditures are no higher.

There seems also to be conflicting estimates on the size of the AIO staff. Its latest return to Washington, dated September 3 last, lists 15 staff members, three of whom were stated to have resigned during the previous 6-month period.

Any exact tally is complicated by the fact that each half-yearly report lists some new staff members and shows several others as having quit.

When I asked acting AIO chief, Prof. Hussein Kamel Selim, in New York, how many persons he had on his staff he said: "About 27." He added that the operation was running on a shoestring budget and they had just been forced to close the TV-radio section for lack of funds.

SMALL BUDGET, RAISED EYEBROWS

Selim normally heads the Washington branch of the AIO and draws an annual salary of $14,400 from the local office appropriation of $25,000. Rahim is paid by Egypt through the Yemeni Government and neither his salary nor his allowances need be reported.

The smallness of the AIO budget caused the eyebrows of several Washington officials to rise when it was brought to their notice.

A senior accountant of the Internal Revenue Service, a man of long experience with corporation accounts, told me: "That's as small a shoestring as I've seen. Even with the total staff of 15 reported I fail to see how an organization with 5 branches can function on $130,000 a year."

As a comparison, the Justice Department offered the expenditures reported by other foreign agents. The South African Tourist Corporation with a staff of only two and one office, spends $131,000. The Swiss National Tourist Office in its New York branch alone spends $266,000 and has a staff of 26. The Indian Information Office spends $191,500, and tiny Portugal reported $140,000 spent in New York with a staff of 17.

A major power like Britain, on the other hand, with offices in several cities, spends more than $1 million on information, $270,000 through the British Broadcasting Corp., and another $801,000 on its tourist bureaus.

But the propaganda field is one in which money moves in mysterious ways. It is not even probable that the Arab Information Office is cooking its books. The penalties for any breach of the law are severe.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY COVERS THE CASH

But there is nothing to prevent the Egyptian Embassy or U.N. delegation, or those of the other Arab States involved, from footing bills in behalf of the AIO. Moving behind their shield of diplomatic immunity their finances are not controlled in any way by the U.S. authorities.

Whatever moneys pass to the American racist groups would certainly be handed over in cash. Even here there is no difficulty in avoiding official scrutiny. In any free money market, like Lebanon or Switzerland, both handily on the route from Cairo to New York, dollars can be bought in any quantity without the transaction being recorded.

Since diplomatic bags are sacrosanct, there is no way of telling how much cash, if any, is brought here in this way.

Except for Gerald L. K. Smith, none of the race groups has any special obligation under law to report either the amount of its income or its source. Smith is in a separate category because his Christian National Crusade takes an active, if never welcome, part in political campaigns and elections. This obliges him to report his expenses and income to the Clerk of the House of Representatives under the Corrupt Practices Act.

Smith, whose Cross and the Flag carries even more than the usual quota of Arab propaganda, picks his favorite candidates in every congressional and presidential election and announces that his "National Political Committee" will throw the full weight of its support behind the chosen ones.

In 1946, for example, Smith hurled his movement behind the Dixiecrats' States Rights ticket, headed by Gov. J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina.

Thurmond denounced the offer by declaring: "We do not invite and we do not need the support of Gerald L. K. Smith or any other rabble rousers who use the race prejudice and class hatred to inflame the emotions of the people."

Smith switched his support to New York's Tom Dewey and Irving M. Ives, GOP nominees for governor and U.S. Senator; Robert M. La Follette, GOP senatorial candidate from Wisconsin, and three Wisconsin Representatives. All repudiated him "with vehemence" and Dewey and Ives jointly declared him "beneath contempt * * * and wholly un-American."

In 1949, Smith's announced decision to back John Foster Dulles for U.S. Senator from New York drew this declaration from the present Secretary of State: "Smith is not a citizen of our State and he has no business here. He can't vote here and I'm glad of it. I have utter contempt for what he stands for and he knows it."

Vice President NIXON, hearing Smith was rooting for him in the 1956 campaign, quickly retorted: "Generally, what Smith says should never be dignified by a comment. But this time * * * I think it is clearly necessary * * * for me to say that there is no place in the Republican Party for race-baiting merchants of hate like Gerald L. K. Smith."

One of the penalties of denouncing Smith and his fellow-racists in this manner, as their publications show, is that the denouncer will in turn be denounced—as a pawn of the Jews, a hireling of the Jews, or very often, however fantastically, simply as a Jew.

NO LAW AGAINST THE CONTRIBUTIONS

These elaborate and active political campaigns of Smith's, however, cost a good deal of money—according to his financial report to Congress.

His total reported expenditure from January 1 to October 30 last year, for example, was $141,859.29 and his receipts for the same period, $168,521.39. There is no law against any individual getting cash from suckers and tossing it around in the name of politics, but the authorities are currently taking an interest in the source of some of Smith's income.

The law demanding his financial statement also requires that the names and addresses be given of all persons donating $100 or more to his organization. Smith lists 151 of these but some curiosity has developed at the Justice Department since learning that some of these contributors seem to exist only on paper.

Of eight listed by Smith in the New York area I was able to confirm the existence only of three. Of the others, either they all contrived to get left off voting lists, out of telephone books and other records or, if persons of the right name lived in the area identified by Smith, they assert they have never heard of either Smith or his setup.

Smith, on his own printed admissions, is virtually in constant contact with Egyptian officials and diplomats.

WRITES ABOUT HIS GUEST FROM EGYPT

In last January's issue of The Cross and the Flag, he boldly identifies one of his friends in an article titled: "A Guest From Egypt." On a visit to Washington, writes Smith, "I was called upon by a brilliant young man who is a citizen of Egypt. His name is Ibrahim Baghdady. He is a journalist and a radio commentator."

Baghdady, however, is not a journalist and radio commentator. He is a major in army intelligence, one of the platoon of intelligence agents Nasser spikes his foreign missions with.

There is little point in listing them all. But intelligence officers sent to the United States on short visits, generally in the role of diplomatic couriers, are worthy of mention.

So also is the fact that the Egyptian State Information Department in Cairo, publisher of most of the tracts distributed and reprinted by America's racists, is a branch of Nasser's security and intelligence network. Lt. Col. Adbel Khadr Hattem, who took over the department during my years in Cairo and who now is deputy minister for presidential affairs, had previously been in command of a group of agents whose function was to snoop on foreign correspondents, tap their telephones, and steam open their mail. He is in charge of all press and radio activities.

The Nasser agents who come here in sheep's clothing are naturally as free as any other visitor to travel around the United States and meet whom they please. That is one of the advantages of working in a free country, a fact Egyptians, especially, would appreciate.

PEDDLING HATE IN AMERICA: EGYPT'S NASSER—CAIRO MAN EXPLAINS HIS BOSS, BUT SOMETIMES HE'S AT A LOSS

(By David Burk)

(Fourth article of a series)

When the Arab Information Office opened in New York in 1955 it informed the Department of Justice in its first registration statement as a foreign agent: "Registrant will strive to further the common interests in peaceful developments, trade, religion, cultural exchange, and tourism."

The AIO's acting head today, in the interim between the reported firing of Ambassador Kamil Abdel Rahim, long a friend of America's lunatic race-hate fringe, and the appointment of a senior army officer to the post, is Prof. Hussein Kamel Selim.

Selim, an able, soft-voiced diplomat who is an apologist for Egyptian President Nasser's ambitious adventures in the Middle East and elsewhere, told me that the AIO was set up by the Arab League to spread the Arab philosophy of tolerance.

"We want good and friendly relations with America and the West," he assured me in his excellent English. "We Arabs are a kind, tolerant, and hospitable people. Our entire cultural orientation is toward the West."

All this is undoubtedly true of the nimble-minded, affable Selim, who studied in Britain, taught economics brilliantly at Cairo University before joining Nasser's government, and has lectured in the United States. Asked if he included Nasser in his good-natured embrace, he said: "Of course I do.

What has Nasser ever done to make you think otherwise?"

CALLS THEM INTERNAL, SPONTANEOUS

A few items came to mind. Such as the vain attempts since 1953 to subvert and annex the Sudan, the assassination of Ibrahim el-Sholhi, principal aid of neighboring Libya's King Idris, the civil war in Lebanon, the repeated forays against Jordan's young King Hussein, the coup that made Syria Egypt's northern province.

"My dear fellow," said Selim with lips that smiled and eyes that didn't, "everyone knows that these events were spontaneous developments from within those countries. No one has ever proved that Nasser had anything to do with them."

This view, along with such others as Nasser's supposed anticommunism, is assiduously spread here by the racist groups acting as a Nasser fifth column in the United States.

It is not shared unanimously by the Arabs themselves, however. President Habib Bourguiba, of Tunisia, for example, recently quit the Arab League and broke off relations with Egypt, charging Nasser was meddling in the affairs of other States, had plotted his assassination, and was unaware of the dangers of communism.

FROM THE ATLANTIC TO PERSIAN GULF

Bourguiba riled Nasser especially with his parting shot in a globally reported broadcast from Tunis. He declared that, contrary to Nasser's claims, the Arab world was united only in poverty and that the Bourguiba alternative to Nasser's flirtation with Moscow was cooperation with the West.

Using a technique significantly similar to that employed by America's racists when under attack, Nasser's personally supervised Cairo radio charged on October 15 that Bourguiba had been bought by the United States and made to betray the Arab League.

"Imperialism," Cairo went on, "has tried out all its agents and every one has been destroyed by the people. All those who stand in the way of the people will be destroyed by the people.

"We shall establish a free and united Arab world from the Atlantic Ocean to the Persian Gulf despite all the conspiracies of imperialism. This is our will in Tunisia, our desire in Sudan, our goal in Algeria."

Such manifestoes, of course, are intended only for local consumption in the Middle East. Abroad, Nasser's men must preach only the Arab will for friendship with the West and its leaders.

Cairo, in its stateside asserted desire for friendship with the United States, cannot, however, prevent America's official radio monitors from picking up such manifestations of brotherly love as this broadcast to pro-Western Jordan last October 6:

"Eisenhower, the old man of the imperialist American dollar, visits his country's hospitals every now and then to undergo some operation or other. This has gone on so long that his body has become one big mass of drugs. * * * Eisenhower's body typifies imperialism, which is strangling.

"The patching, reconciliations and taking of sedatives cannot obstruct the self-liberation movements throughout the world. * * * The ultimate treatment for a septic part of the body is amputation, and as the many patches on Eisenhower's body will eventually cause him to wind up on the city dump, so will the imperialist struggle definitely fall into the abyss."

MILITARY MISSION IN JORDAN ASSAILED

Another Nasser broadcast, on October 15, denounced the U.S. military mission to Jordan as "all high-ranking officers, more than a third of whom have worked under Allen Dulles, chief of American intelligence * * * and * * * more concerned with spying and plotting than its stated purpose."

Moreover, the broadcast added, "some of the mission members are Zionists * * * who will convey your Army's secrets to Israel. Beware of this mission and endeavor to crush it."

Professor Selim has no comment on these broadcasts but he is anxious to point out that Nasser is a good Moslem and the Moslem religion teaches that "Moses and Jesus must be revered alongside Mohammed." Therefore, Selim insists, neither Nasser nor his representatives could possibly have anything to do with lunatic Americans who preach race hatred.

"Don't you see," said Selim earnestly, "if we are associated in any way with these infamous hate groups, our cause would be harmed, not helped. We don't hate anyone. Why should we?"

Selim expressed amazement when specific instances of Nasser's men consorting with racists were mentioned. Such as the time when Abdel Mawgoud Hassan, press officer of the Egyptian U.N. delegation, addressed one of New York Feuhrer James Madole's muckraking meetings.

ADMITS HE HAS LIST OF FASCIST GROUPS

"Perhaps," said Selim hopefully, "Hassan didn't know who Madole was."

He conceded that the office has a copy of the Attorney General's list of subversive Fascist groups, which includes both Madole and his National Renaissance Party. He also conceded that it behooves a diplomat to make inquiries before accepting invitations to address meetings.

Hassan himself, when nailed on the subject during a recent television interview, at first denied that he had been present. When, however, he was shown a photograph of himself sitting beside Madole on the rostrum, he went through the rest of the program like a man with violent stomach cramps.

What, I asked Selim, about the racists who visit official Arab offices and join Arab diplomats in the delegates' lounge at the U.N.? The most prominent of these is Benjamin H. (for Harrison) Freedman, 68, retired toilet goods manufacturer and son of Moritz and Hannah Kaferman Freedman, immigrants from 19th century Hungary.

GRILLED FOR DAYS ON WITNESS STAND

Freedman, who once described himself in court as "without religion, though I was born a Jew, practice Catholicism and belong to the Masons," has a 10-year record of anti-Semitism.

"What can we do if such persons approach us and want to talk?" Selim asked me blandly. "You know how kindly we Arabs are. Could we tell such a man to go away and leave us alone?"

I said that, since Selim himself felt association with such persons damaged the Arab cause which he was here to further, the only course seemed to be a good firm snub. Selim renewed the bland smile that moved his lips but not his eyes.

Freedman's record came out in a New York court in 1948. He was a witness for the plaintiff when attorney Hallam M. Richardson, leading light of Freedman's League for Peace With Justice in Palestine, sued an anti-Nazi organization for libel for saying he had been long known in the halls of pro-Fascist propaganda.

Under skillful cross-examination Freedman spent several days on the witness stand. The sum of his testimony proved of greater value to the defense than to Richardson.

Copies of cables exchanged between Freedman and Haj Amin el-Husseini, former mufti of Jerusalem who broadcast to the Arabs for Hitler during World War II, were produced in court. Freedman also admitted frequently visiting Arab friends in Washington and having spent $100,000 of his own money to advertise his cause.

This last fact resulted in a glowing eulogy by the ex-mufti, printed in Cairo and titled: "An American Jew Spends His Efforts and Riches in Protection of the Arabs."

The libel claim was thrown out of court and the judge described Freedman as an international meddler and propagandist.

HE HAS GOOD OF THE UNITED STATES IN MIND

When I called on Freedman at his sumptuous 960 Park Ave. apartment I learned that his views have not changed in the last 10 years. Before I was admitted, I had to prove my identity, declare that I was not a Jew and do not work for any investigative agency.

"The Zionists," Freedman assured me, "drove me into the arms of men like McGinley and Gerald L. K. Smith, I'd neither met nor heard of them before the Zionists started to smear me."

He scanned me piercingly through a pince-nez and said: "I am thinking only of the good of the United States. I was born here, you know. That's why I believe we should recognize not only Red China, but also North Korea and East Germany, in the interests of the survival of the United States and the free world."

The United States, he said, has only 6 percent of the total world population while Afro-Asia has 80 percent. By alienating Afro-Asia, the United States was destroying its commercial potential.

Freedman puts out a sheet called Fact for Fact. It describes itself as "An official publication of the Foundation for Advanced Research, a nonprofit membership foundation incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware." The foundation address is given as 505 Fifth Avenue, but don't waste time looking it up in the directories. It isn't listed.

Fact for Fact—"only research reveals all the facts * * * the whole truth"—offers the usual line about communism being part of the Jewish conspiracy; the Jews not being Semites at all but descendants of a converted Asian tribe called the Khazars; and Eisenhower, Dulles, and everyone else who does anything the racists disapprove of being the tools of the Zionists.

CHARGES GIANT SMEAR CAMPAIGN

After Eisenhower signed the Middle East Doctrine in 1957, says Freedman, for example, "every media of mass-communications in the United States owned and controlled by the Zionist heirarchy, the leading newspapers, the television and radio nationwide networks, the leading weekly magazines, the motion picture newsreels, and the many other equally effective media in the United States also owned and controlled by the Zionist heirarchy, immediately commenced the most unjustified and unwarranted smear campaign accusing Egypt and Syria of being countries controlled by international communism. The purpose was quite obvious."

The denial of Mid-East communism or Communist inclination is a favorite racist theme that does not bear genuine inspection. One of the commonest claims is that Nasser outlawed the Communist Party in Egypt. He did no such thing because Egypt never really had a Communist Party to outlaw. He did, however, outlaw every other political party to clear the way for himself.

REDS TOO BUSY BATTLING REDS

The Communists had been illegal under Farouk and had been underground long before Nasser's so-called revolution in 1952. And characteristically Middle Eastern, they split into seven groups instead of fighting for unity. From that point on they ceased to concern the authorities because they were too busy fighting each other to be dangerous.

The Soviet embassy in Egypt, fully aware of these facts, shrewdly decided it would reap a bigger dividend by ignoring the Communists and dealing directly with Nasser.

PEDDLING HATE IN AMERICA: EGYPT'S NASSER—AN ANTI-RED MASK COVERS TRUE FACE OF FASCISM IN UNITED STATES

(By David Burk)

(Last article of a series)

America's lunatic racist fringe poses as vehemently anti-Communist. The obvious reason for this is that there are potentially millions in the country today who, strongly anti-Communist, would refuse to support any movement preaching interracial hatred.

However, by asserting that communism is part of a Jewish international conspiracy and throwing in vicious slanders of the Negro for good measure, the Fascists can make some headway. By whitewashing Nasser's regime and his relationship with Moscow with the assertion that he is the only anti-Communist in the Middle East, they also can satisfy the patron whose cause, authorities believe, they are being paid to serve.

Thinking Americans—some 99.9 percent—still wait to be convinced, however, especially in the face of such denunciations as this:

"Advocates of both fascism and communism seek to destroy our constitutional government and supplant it with a godless dictatorship in which the individual is deprived of his rights and liberties to become an abject slave. Both derive their strength by dividing their opposition—communism choosing to set class against class, while fascism incites racial and religious discord."

HOUSE COMMITTEE DRAWS A PICTURE

The words are those of the House Committee on Un-American Activities in a recent report on neo-Fascist and hate groups in the United States. The committee adds:

"Despite the similarities between communism and fascism, their propaganda to the effect that each is the foremost opponent of the other is undoubtedly a major contributor to whatever support each has been able to muster in our population."

But, the committee warns, "the appearance of neo-Fascist organizations and methods * * * serves only to impede the intelligent, united effort necessary in the current life and death struggle with communism. * * * Depending on the type of audience to be reached, this (Fascist) propaganda is couched in language ranging from violent vituperation to subtle innuendoes."

The committee investigators found that the various groups frequently cooperate with exchanges of literature and many are led by racketeers primarily for the purpose of reaping financial profit.

Conde McGinley of Union, N.J., said by the committee to be making at least $30,000 a year out of Common Sense and his book lists, recently put out a billboard-size sheet giving a rundown of a Goebbels' fabrication of three decades ago—the so-called Protocols of the Meetings of the Learned Elders of Zion.

The Protocols were exploded as a fiction in the 30's, but McGinley evidently felt the time was ripe to produce them again. And if he succeeded in selling no one else on them, he certainly triumphed with Gamal Abdel Nasser in Cairo.

Toward the end of October, in a remarkable interview with an Indian magazine writer, Nasser declared that he had just read the Protocols for the first time and thought them important. They demonstrated to him, he said, that Europe is in the hands of 300 Zionists and that there is an international plot in which Zionism and imperialism (i.e. the United States, Britain and France) are marching hand in hand with Israel."

McGinley handed down the Protocols to his followers with an appeal to read and study this document carefully. It speaks, he wrote, in behalf of the American people * * * is prepared without anger * * * (because) many gentile Americans have been drawn into this plot by ignorance, through blackmail, through clever persuasion.

A great deal of the juggled history which propagandists like McGinley use as the basis for their outpourings is dredged up by pudgy bachelor Harold N. Arrowsmith, who admits having financed Arlington, Va., fuehrer George Lincoln Rockwell and the Yorkville thugs Rockwell sent to Washington and Atlanta to sing his hymn of hate.

Arrowsmith and Rockwell are currently squabbling. Each told me at great length, and in highly slanderous terms, what he had against the other. The main reason, apparently, was Arrowsmith's indignation at being identified by Rockwell as the "fat cat" (financier) mentioned in Rockwell's letter to one of the men charged with the Atlanta temple blast.

HE LIKES TO STAY OUT OF LIMELIGHT

Arrowsmith made no bones about his preference for staying in the background. He described himself as a research worker with "fortunately a private income large enough to let me do the things I like." He estimated this income at around $15,000 a year from an inheritance from his late father, Dr. Harold Noel Arrowsmith, longtime canon of Baltimore's Cathedral Church of the Incarnation.

He lives with his mother in patrician style in the quiet of a wealthy Baltimore suburb and the family is listed in the city's blue book. I was received after identifying myself to a Negro manservant at the screened front door and shown into a study, elegantly furnished but littered with samples of Arrowsmith's work.

Since the spring of 1957, said Arrowsmith, he has been devoting himself to digging in Washington archives and at the British Museum in London for the "truth behind the Zionist-Communist conspiracy." He presented me with a sheaf of extracts from Hansard (British Parliament's equivalent of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), official reports by H.M. Government, and articles written by a variety of personages ranging from Zionist leaders to Winston Churchill.

"When I showed this stuff to the British Information Service in New York," boasted Arrowsmith, beaming cherubically, "they nearly fell off their chairs."

John Peck, head of the BIS in the United States, later told me he recalled "some strange individual who came in with a pile of bumph but we didn't pay much attention to it." Peck added: "Goodness knows why he went all the way to the British Museum. We have all these documents in our library here."

Asked about Lincoln Rockwell's statement that Arrowsmith once had taken the "head of Nasser's secret service" to visit him, Arrowsmith said: "That's a damned lie. I know these people, of course, but I wouldn't take anyone like that to see a scoundrel like Rockwell."

KNEW NOTHING ABOUT BOMBING, HE SAYS

In fact, it was mainly on the subject of his erstwhile protege that Arrowsmith really opened up. He said: "I thought I could handle Rockwell but I found that I was wrong. He's a dangerous character. His political ideas are asinine and he has a fuehrer complex."

However, he revealed, he had made a $15,200 cash downpayment on Rockwell's house on Arlington's Williamsburg Blvd., and spent more than $6,000 to install photo-litho printing equipment in the cellar.

"It was very naughty of Rockwell to say I was his 'fat cat,'" Arrowsmith pouted angrily. "I didn't have anything to do with the Atlanta bombing. I knew nothing about it. All I did was pay the cost of Rockwell's picketing in July in Washington and Atlanta and for the printing of 15,000 or 20,000 leaflets."

In Arlington, Rockwell was nearly as loquacious. He is 40, the same age as Arrowsmith, but tall, well-built and with an air of earnest sincerity that is quite disarming. He, too, checked my identity carefully before admitting me, then politely asked if he might see inside my coat and briefcase to insure that I was carrying no recording equipment.

He repaid me with the signal honor of allowing me to be the first newsman ever to see his cellar workshop-office.

"Everyone's gunning for me," he said, explaining his caution. "Can't be too careful."

Since police found some personal letters of his in the home of Wallace Allen, one of the men currently under indictment for the Atlanta bombing, telephone threats have been a daily occurrence, Rockwell declared. Things had gotten so bad, he added, that he was in the process of sending his wife and three children to Iceland, Mrs. Rockwell's original home.

Then he was launched on the subject of Arrowsmith.

"He picked me," said Rockwell (and these notes were taken in his presence), "because he wanted a tough anti-Jew fighter. He wanted them tougher and tougher."

BOASTS OF BUNCH OF REAL TOUGHIES

"I've got a bunch of boys in Yorkville who are real tough. Arrowsmith wanted my boys. All I have to do is send for them and they'd be here in a flash. They'll do anything I ask them."

These boys also were mentioned in Rockwell's letter to Allen, which said: "The boys are coming from New York for the work here—no guts in the local citizens * * *." One of the young bully-boys who went south at Rockwell's bidding for the Atlanta and Washington picketing last July (most of the slogans were pro-Nasser) was 21-year-old George Leggett, 111–29 78th Avenue, Forest Hills, leader of a group in Queens and Yorkville called the United Nordic Federation.

Leggett, who has no German blood, used the name of George von Lichter and was known as the Fuehrer of Forest Hills. He is currently in jail awaiting sentence for plotting with his gang last January to rob a bank of $40,000 to finance an upstate camp for training storm troopers. He was free on bail at the time of his southern trip.

It came out, too, that another gentleman for whom Leggett and his gang had performed various services was New York fuehrer James Madole.

Rockwell, who says he attended Brown University and was a U.S. Navy commander in World War II, then laid the policy of his National Committee To Free America From Jewish Domination on the line. In fact, he gave me a preview of a new 7-point program "that hasn't even gone to the printer's yet."

The essence of his philosophy—"unlike Arrowsmith's," he pointed out—is his basic tolerance. He said: "Most of the people on our side, 90 percent of those who work in the open, are crackpots. Isolationists, anti-Negro, totally anti-Jewish, many anti-Catholics. Most are fanatics on one or two subjects.

"We, on the other hand, are religiously uncommitted, international, pro-Negro, pro-private enterprise, national socialist, and anticapitalist. * * * The basic aspects of our world view are the same as Adolf Hitler's. He was a gift from an inscrutable providence. A world savior in his time."

THEY'D ESTABLISH A NEGRO NATION

He described himself as "antidictatorship, though no part of society has the right to complete freedom." The Jews, under Rockwellism, would all be carefully investigated and "those found to have had no part in the world Marxist conspiracy would not be harmed."

The Rockwellians also have the answer to the integration problem. They would, he said, "appropriate the $10 billion now being spent on integration to establish an ultra-modern, fully-equipped nation for the Negro in Africa."

Rockwell declared that he has "500 hard-core supporters spread through the world—in Egypt, Iceland, the United States, and Europe." There is no membership card as yet and no real organization as such, he said, but added:

"Since the Atlanta business I've been living on pennies. I'm thinking of trying to register as a foreign agent and working for the Arabs. I want to cut off money to Israel. I think the Arabs should be willing to pay me a salary for that.

"Also," he added, evidently with an eye to the fat incomes some of his longer-established rival fuehrers are racking up, "I plan to form a national organization with myself at the head on a salaried basis."

As I climbed back into my taxi outside Rockwell's neat surburban home I felt I had come full cycle. The jigsaw pieces had clicked into place. Rockwell was tied in with Arrowsmith and thus with Madole and with McGinley and Smith and Freedman and with Cairo, in a network of subversive hate. Each group feeding on the others like jungle animals, on a diet of shady finance, propaganda gimmicks, and methods and ideas that reek of Red Moscow and Nazi Berlin.

U.S. AIR FORCES IN EUROPE

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, each year the Air Force, and I believe the same is true of the Navy and Army so far as their installations are concerned, sends a selected group of reservists to inspect our airbases in Europe and to discuss our defense problems with American officials there. In 1958 a prominent Alabamian, Lt. Col. Starr Smith, of Montgomery, was among those chosen.

On his return, he wrote a most interesting and informative résumé of his findings and impressions for the November 23 issue of the Montgomery Advertiser. This article would, I am sure, be found to be of interest to Members of Congress and others who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONTGOMERIAN FINDS USAFE KEEPS PEACE WITH DETERMINATION

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Montgomery public relations man Starr Smith is a lieutenant colonel in the Air Force Reserve. He recently completed a tour of U.S. Air Force bases in Europe. A former newspaperman and wartime intelligence officer, Smith here gives Advertiser-Journal readers his impressions of our Air Force in Europe.)

(By Starr Smith)

An American returning home after a visit with his countrymen serving with the U.S. Air Forces in Europe has, of course, many memories of his stay abroad.

My most unforgettable impression came with a remark from a young colonel at a U.S. fighter base in France, who said, "Sure it's rough over here. Living is hard. My wife and I and our three children live in a trailer that's too small for us. In the winter it's cold and muddy and in the summer it's hot and dusty. A lot of my friends live in big houses back in the States and in Germany.

"But I wouldn't trade with them. I've got the best job in the Air Force. You see, in my job here I can fly the F–100 Super Sabre jet and it's worth it."

BELIEF IN MISSION

The colonel's spirit and pride in his job fairly well sums up, I think, the general attitude of Air Force people at all U.S. bases, large and small, in Germany, France, and England. On my recent tour of these countries it was clear and evident that if ability, determination, confidence, and belief in mission can keep the peace—or win a war—Americans and freedom-loving people the world over can place their trust in the U.S. Air Force in Europe.

This kind of spirit must always begin at the top and filter downward through all ranks. Setting the pace is the U.S. commander, Gen. Frank F. Everest, a calm and confident West Pointer who wears his four stars with a grace that only years of top command and experience can give.

General Everest has spent considerable time at Maxwell and is a graduate of the old Air Corps Tactical School. He has the "fondest memories" of Montgomery and his old friends here.

FOUR-PART COMMAND

General Everest's command stretches from England to Pakistan. There are four major components: 3d Air Force, with headquarters near London; 17th Air Force, which operates from headquarters in Tripoli; the 322d Air Division, a combat cargo and troop carrier organization with headquarters at Evreux, France, and a number of tactical and reconnaissance wings attached directly to USAFE headquarters.

There is a wing of Matador guided missiles stationed deep in the forests of Germany. General Everest's main offices are at Weisbaden, Germany, and his operational headquarters are located at Ramstein, some 50 miles to the south. Maj. Gen. G. I. Disosway, also well known in Montgomery, commands this advanced unit.

PART IN NATO

While General Everest's units are not generally considered to be in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) command, a major part of his tactical wings are integrated into the NATO structure for wartime planning purposes and would be a part of NATO forces in the event of war. Under NATO is the wartime command organization, Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe (SHAPE), headed by another U.S. Air Force officer, Gen. Lauris Norstad. This organization includes the Armed Forces, Air, Army, and Navy, of all NATO nations.

USAFE's tactical forces are equipped with faster-than-sound fighters, all-weather reconnaissance planes and bomber aircraft. Their pilots are at constant alert facing toward the Iron Curtain. American F–100 Super Sabre jets fly daily missions over Western Europe, and squadrons of F–86D Sabrejets stand by, engines warm, on 24-hour watch, ready to rise and climb at a second's notice to meet possible enemy aircraft.

Early one crisp and frosty morning I stood at the end of a concrete runway in Germany and watched young F–6D pilots get their planes off the ground and into the air over the misty Rhine in less than 6 minutes.

Many of these young pilots received their commissions through the Air Force ROTC program which is commanded by Maj. Gen. T. C. Rogers, headquartered at Maxwell Air Force Base. Senior Air Force commanders in Europe speak glowingly of these AFROTC graduates and the training given them by General Rogers and his staff. Typical of this praise was the comment of Col. Ray Tolliver, commander of the 20th Fighter-Bomber Wing, an F–100 outfit stationed at Wethersfield, England, who said, "send us more AFROTC-trained officers. They are topflight, enthusiastic and spirited."

OFF TO LEBANON

One of the most glamorous U.S. flying outfits in Europe is the famed 322d Air Division. This combat cargo and troop carrier organization flies the C–119, C–123, C–124, and the celebrated and worthy C–130. Commander of this division based at Evreux, France, is a lean and able Texan, Col. Clyde Box. It was the 322d that carried much of the cargo for the Lebanon landing last summer. As Colonel Box put it, "We had our first plane loaded and in the air headed for the Middle East within an hour after the order came in."

Setting up an operation similar to the Lebanon project is nothing new to U.S. Air Force in Europe. It was USAFE that initiated the never-to-be-forgotten Berlin airlift, and each year airlift operations are carried out as a means of furthering international good will and relieving suffering.

No report of the Air Force in Europe would be complete without discussing living conditions of families or dependents, as they are called. Some families live in trailers, even those of high ranking officers. You see these trailers mostly in France and England.

The ladies have done a lot to improve the situation—small flower gardens, sidewalks, and other attractions are often seen. At Toul-Rosiere, France, I saw a trailer camp as comfortable as any in the States. At Sculthorpe in England, near the North Sea, there are no trailers or housing on the base. Air Force people must rent houses or apartments in towns or villages.

HOUSING TIGHT

This can be rough. Not many places are available. It's not uncommon to find an American officer or airman who drives 50 miles, round trip, each day to and from work. But all in all, housing conditions in Europe are not too unpleasant.

There are 9 high schools and 58 elementary schools run by the U.S. Air Force in Europe, with American teachers. These are fully accredited and some are boarding schools. One of these is located at Bushey Park, near London, where in 1944 General Eisenhower had his supreme headquarters.

I was often at Bushey Park during the war and the other day visiting a classroom there, I realized just how far we have come in international affairs. High school students from Air Force families in England come to class at Bushey Park, living on campus, and going home on weekends. There is a similar school at Wiesbaden, Germany. Altogether there are more than 20,000 children of Air Force personnel getting their education in this dependent school program in Europe.

RELIGION IMPORTANT

Religious activity is important for these Americans abroad. On most bases are new and modernistic chapels, and several chaplains told me that church attendance is far better than in the States.

General Everest has more than 225,000 Americans—Air Force personnel, their families, and civil workers—under his command in Europe. These people seem to have a strong sense of duty and knowledge of their responsibility in critical times. They are serving well the cause of peace, in spite of personal hardships in some cases.

Everywhere in Europe I met Air Force people with good memories of Montgomery: Col. Thornton Peek wanted to be remembered to Sam Durden; Col. Robert Ackerly remembered Grover Hall from their wartime days in England; Col. Clifford Evenson sent good wishes to Frank Mizell; Col. Andy Curbo, former Gunter commander, spoke fondly of Paul Fuller; Col. John Nottingham, editor of the Stars and Stripes, paid us perhaps the best compliment of all—upon retirement he's coming back to Prattville to live.

HOW LABOR CAN HELP IMPROVE PUBLIC EDUCATION

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on January 26, in San Francisco, Mr. James B. Carey, vice president of the AFL–CIO and president of the International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, delivered a hard-hitting address, entitled "How Labor Can Help Improve Public Education," before the 19th annual convention of the National School Boards Association.

I wish to call particular attention to Mr. Carey's statement that the labor movement has "already given our strongest possible endorsement to the Murray-Metcalf bill which would appropriate $1.1 billion the first year and $11.4 billion over a 4-year period for new school construction and teachers salaries."

Mr. Carey goes on to make the thought-provoking statement that the $1.1 billion for the first year "equals the cost of just 10 days of fighting the cold war as measured by current defense appropriations."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Carey's speech be printed in the body of the RECORD immediately following these remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW LABOR CAN HELP IMPROVE PUBLIC EDUCATION

(Address by James B. Carey, vice president of the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations, and president of the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers AFL–CIO, 19th annual convention of the National School Board Association, Civic Auditorium Center, San Francisco, Calif., January 26, 1959.)

One hundred and thirty years ago this month in a small dimly lit hall in New York City, a revolutionary document was read to a group of eagerly attentive workingmen.

The document was lengthy but it rose to a moving climax for the entire audience in one single sentence:

"We seek," the document proclaimed, "a system that shall unite under the same roof the children of the poor man and the rich, the widow's charge and the orphan, where the road to distinction shall be superior industry, virtue and acquirement without reference to descent."

The year was 1829. The occasion was a meeting of the newly formed Workingmen's Party. The document—revolutionary chiefly in the declaration I have quoted—was the party's platform.

Thus began the movement for a free education system in the United States.

But in point of strict historical fact, there were earlier beginnings.

The American labor movement in that year of 1829 was only 2 years old, in the sense that just 2 years previously the first central body, combining a number of different crafts, had made its appearance in the United States.

But individual local unions, up and down the eastern seaboard, starting in the 1790's, had set free education as one of their principal goals.

This orientation, in the years that followed, resulted in a unique development in American unionism, a development unparalleled in the history of any other labor movement.

I refer to the extraordinary and little-known fact that during those early years, particularly through the 1820's and 1830's, organized labor's first and foremost goal was not higher pay or shorter hours or better working conditions. Astonishingly, the No. 1 goal, more often than not, was free education.

There were, in the 1830's, a surprisingly large number of labor newspapers. Almost always under the page 1 masthead and at the top of the editorial columns appeared the slogan: "Equal universal education."

Why this extraordinary concentration on education? The miracle and the glory of the American Revolution was still fresh in men's memories. The very air that men breathed was vibrant with the promises held out by self-determination and self-government. The Declaration of Independence seemed to speak directly to our early workingmen when it asserted that "all men are created equal." Equal men should have equal rights, the unions asserted, but only through education can free men vote intelligently for leaders and policies to govern them.

"Never," says Historian Foster Rhea Dulles, "have a people had a greater faith in education—'the greatest blessing bestowed upon mankind'—than this generation of Americans. The workers could not have been more determined in demanding it for their children as a right to which they were morally entitled."

Educational reform was indeed needed. Tax supported schools existed only in sections of New England. Elsewhere there was virtually no provision of any kind for the education of workers' children. Dulles relates that—

"Even in such populous and wealthy States as New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware—to say nothing of the new States in the West or the backward States of the South—the only provision for the children of workingmen and other poor families was the charity school—inadequate, inefficient, and socially degrading."

In New York City in 1829 there were more than 24,000 children between 5 and 15 who had never attended school. In Pennsylvania it was found that out of 400,000 children, 250,000 had no schooling of any kind.

There was, of course, opposition to the idea of free schools; vitriolic opposition from industry, business and the commercial press. The National Gazette, for example, angrily contended that "universal, equal education is impossible, if trade, manufacturing, and manual labor are to be successfully prosecuted—unless the standards of education be greatly lowered and narrowed."

Business and industry had ample reason for their opposition. Rare was the large-scale enterprise that didn't employ child labor; and free education would, of course, remove a cutrate work force. But the burgeoning labor movement was deadly serious and determined to win this struggle.

With free universal education as the primary plank in its platform, the Workingmen's Party, just a few months after its organization in 1829, entered the New York City elections and polled an astonishing 6,000 of the 21,000 votes cast.

This was encouraging, but the first great victory came not in New York but in Pennsylvania. In that State, the birthplace of American unionism, labor's persistent efforts finally bore fruit in 1834, when the legislature enacted a bill establishing a free, tax-supported school system. That was the turning point; in the years that followed, other States, one by one, fell into line.

Thus Thomas Jeffersons' dream of a half century before, a democratic dream of free public education, was realized; and it was realized by those whom it was chiefly designed to benefit—workingmen and their children.

It was labor's triumph, the inauguration of free public education, for there were no other groups of comparable size or influence in American society that supported this great step forward. On the contrary, most other organizations and groups were either opposed or skeptical. Even large sections of the clergy took the side of the employers, claiming that public schools would leave children too much free time to get in trouble, whereas 10 or 12 hours a day in a shop or a plant would keep the children under surveillance and leave them too fatigued for troublemaking after their work was done.

It was, history tells us, labor's triumph, but it was far from a final victory. Some of the biggest battles were yet to be waged and won, and the labor movement set itself, heart and soul, to winning them.

Free public education had arrived, but attendance was optional. As a result, child labor, the exploitation of tots 6 and 7 years old, was still a blight on American civilization.

In the 1860's, therefore, the labor movement started pressing heavily for compulsory schooling. Slowly, painfully this fight was successful. Gradually labor found that it was no longer alone in the struggle; large sections of the public had become converted, even if business and industry had not. Yet, as late as 1912 the labor movement had to call indignant attention to the fact that "of the 25 million children of school age in the United States, 50 percent leave school at the end of the sixth grade, at approximately 14 years of age." In 1920 organized labor was fighting for academic freedom and for compulsory school attendance up to the age of 16.

Down through the years American unions continued their determined campaigns for more and better schools, for more and better trained teachers, adequate financing of school systems, free textbooks, and more State and municipal colleges.

Looking back on this dedicated, century-long struggle, John Dewey declared of the labor movement, "I say without any fear of contradiction that there is no organization in the United States—I do not care what its nature is—that has such a fine record in the program of liberal progressive public education."

I have related this history for two reasons:

First, to indicate the abiding pride that the labor movement takes in the role it has played in the origins and the development of the American public school system and free, compulsory education, and

Second—and more important—to emphasize not simply organized labor's vigorous interest in the current crisis in American education but rather labor's deep historical sense of responsibility to do something about this crisis.

THE PROBLEM AS LABOR SEES IT

The crisis in education, as we in labor see it today, probably differs from the way that you, as school board members, see it only in background and emphasis.

Basically, the labor movement sees the problem as this:

1. The need for more schools and better schools.

2. The need for more teachers, better trained teachers and better paid teachers.

3. The swift and complete abolition of segregated educational facilities.

4. A rethinking of curriculums to meet the new challenges of the space age and the atomic era.

5. Improved health safeguards for students, expanded medical protections, enlarged benefits under the milk and lunch programs.

6. The need for a reorientation in public thinking to comprehend not only the urgency of the problem but also the fact that it is no longer a town, a city and a county problem but a national and Federal problem as well.

The eminent historian, Hannah Arendt, recently wrote: "The crisis in education, which as it happens can best be observed in America, is really just one aspect of the general crisis that has overtaken the modern world everywhere and in almost every sphere of life."

That, I believe, is labor's viewpoint. We do not conceive that the crisis in education can be separated from the billions of dollars that must be poured into a defense economy, into armaments and into planes that cost their weight in gold. We do not believe that the crisis in education can be separated from the fact that the United States currently has nearly 5 million unemployed and other millions on short workweeks. We do not believe that our school problems are divorced from an unjust and disbalanced tax structure, nor from the fact that living costs last year climbed faster than disposable income. School problems, we believe, are not remote from the fact that 8 million workers were compelled to depend on unemployment compensation benefits last year, double the number of any previous year; and that 12,500,000 American families, 1 out of every 4 in the country, were hit by the recession in 1958.

The problem, as labor sees it, is indeed a complex one. Perhaps it's even more complex than we know; especially when we reflect on the recent statement by President Clark Kerr, of the University of California—a tongue-in-the-cheek statement, I'm sure—that "the three major administrative problems on a campus are sex for the students, athletics for the alumni, and parking for the faculty."

Let us review briefly the problems of classroom and teacher shortages as labor sees them.

Former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Marion Folsom declared last week that we need, this year alone, 125,000 more classrooms. We of labor feel that his estimate is unrealistically low. We believe, and our belief is shared by a number of educational authorities and major newspapers, that the need this year is for a minimum of 132,000 classrooms in 1959 and at least 400,000 in the next 5 years.

I need not describe the physical plight of our school system to you who know it so much more intimately than I. Let me just emphasize that primarily they are workers' children, the children of wage earners who are victimized by overcrowding, split shifts, and part-time classes. They are chiefly workers' children, the 2,500,000 boys and girls who currently can attend school for only half a day.

But if the classroom problem is dismaying, we of labor see the teacher problem as absolutely appalling; and the teacher problem isn't just one of numbers.

Mr. Folsom estimates that we need 135,000 qualified teachers this year. Again we of labor think that he is on the conservative side, that the figure should be closer to 150,000 for an adequately staffed educational system and to compensate for those who leave for marriage, or who retire or quit for higher paid nonteaching jobs. We of labor believe that we must employ 1,500,000 new teachers in the next 10 years.

Moreover, it's not only quantity but quality also that we of the labor movement are concerned about. I refer to the fact that today American children are being taught by 300,000 teachers who do not meet minimum certification requirements.

Finally, and indisputably most important, is the problem of teachers' salaries. Here, no doubt, is the nub of the problems of quantity and quality in the teaching profession.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about this entire question of teachers' pay is the near unanimity among Americans, on the one hand, that teachers' salaries are disgracefully low, and the failure of these same Americans, on the other hand, to do anything about them.

The average teacher, we are told, earns about $4,520 a year, but the range is from a high of $5,925 in California and $5,800 in New York down to $2,225 in Mississippi. Moreover, one out of every four classroom teachers in our country is paid less than $3,500 a year. Such figures should make all of us blush with shame, and then make us furiously angry.

Despite their academic and professional training, despite their enormous responsibilities, teachers on the average receive less than scores of categories of skilled and unskilled workers. In my own electrical and machine manufacturing industry the average annual pay is $4,550. The average for all American factory workers is $4,555. Compared with the $4,520 average teacher's pay, the average auto worker receives $5,304 a year and the aircraft worker the same.

To continue the comparison: Here in San Francisco the average wage for auto mechanics is $5,512 a year, for carpenters $5,616, for tool-and-die makers $6,177, and for all factory workers $5,324.

Teachers are professionals. Perhaps I should say they are supposed to be or are reputed to be professionals, because while their average yearly salary is $4,520 that of the average professional in the United States is $7,600.

According to U.S. Labor Department calculations, the average teacher doesn't even enjoy a minimum living standard. Department figures show that an American wage earner with a wife and two children needs a minimum of $4,656 a year for a modest but adequate living standard. But the Heller committee of the University of California found in September 1957 that a worker here in San Francisco needed $5,832 a year to support his family at minimum standards.

In view of these facts, I find it amusing that at a conference in Washington not long ago, school teachers were urged to stop "moonlighting," a term that came out of industry to describe a second job usually worked at night. But the National Education Association has told you that the average male teacher is forced to "moonlight" or else work during his vacation in order to earn 10 percent of his total income. In addition, to make ends meet, 3 out of 10 teachers' wives find it necessary to take full-time jobs.

In view of all this, no one can wonder at the inability of our educational system to attract outstanding people to the profession. The starting pay offered to teachers in most sections of the country, compared to the starting pay offered by business and industry, is more than enough to discourage thousands of potential teachers.

The solution to the teachers' salary problem, labor believes, must be a drastic one. We have waited far too long now to try to solve our dilemma by piddling salary hikes of 10 and 15 percent. We of labor, in this instance, find ourselves in agreement with Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Arthur Flemming, when he says:

"I think the most serious weakness in our total educational system today is our salary structure. I don't care whether you are talking about elementary or secondary education, or whether you are talking about higher education. I think as a Nation we should be ashamed of the compensation we pay those who are willing to serve us in what is certainly one of the most important areas in which people can serve our society today.

"There are those who say that we won't correct the situation unless we are willing to double the salaries now being paid. Personally I am willing to subscribe to it."

We of labor concur but with this caveat. That doubling must be done immediately. Teachers' salaries must be doubled now, or else they will have to be tripled in a very few years. And then it might be too late.

But not only classrooms and teachers concern the labor movement. We are concerned, for example, over the large number of students who drop out of high school because they have discovered they will never be able to afford the increasingly expensive tuition scales charged by most colleges and universities.

We of labor are concerned with the 100,000 students who graduate in the upper third of their classes but who, according to the U.S. Office of Education, do not continue their education into college for financial reasons. We are concerned not only because of the waste and loss to the Nation, but also because the majority of these 100,000 students must necessarily come from workingmen's families.

Similarly we are concerned with the fact that at the very time the Nation needs engineers and scientists as never before in its history, the number of students enrolling for engineering courses, during the year just ended, dropped an alarming 11 percent.

We of labor are deeply concerned with the health of our children in primary and secondary schools. We object strongly to a price tag being tied to immunization shots. We are opposed to any school or municipal arrangement whereby children from wealthy and well-to-do families, but not those from poor and underprivileged families, receive inoculations against polio, influenza, and other epidemic diseases.

The immunization program should be free and universal as should eye and ear examinations. We advocate free heart and cancer examinations for children, just as lung X-rays for tuberculosis are free in most school systems today. The time will come, we are sure, when complete physical exams will be available to primary and secondary school students without charge.

Still another school problem with which labor is vitally concerned is nutrition. Four billion half pints of milk a year are now consumed by schoolchildren at a cost to them of about 3 cents a half pint. The 4 billions sounds impressive but we of labor aren't the least bit satisfied with it, nor with the national school lunch program either. Our reasons are simple. The Nation today has about 138,000 primary and secondary public schools, but only 76,000 schools participate in the milk program and only 60,000 participate in the school lunch program.

I am ashamed and I think the Nation should be ashamed of the spectacle we witnessed in Washington, D.C., last month when our District of Columbia school officials were compelled, in effect, to go begging to the public, to private citizens, for money to feed 1,000 needy schoolchildren.

Hat in hand, as it were, our school superintendent asked the citizens of our Nation's Capital to dig into their pockets to provide free lunches to meet a critical need.

Our Washington newspapers reported, "Junior and senior high schools in Washington have cafeterias and provide free meals to needy students, but there are no food facilities in the grade schools and Congress provides no money for lunches for children from marginal income families. Efforts of PTA groups and neighborhood organizations to pay for lunch programs have been unsuccessful because the schools that have the biggest problems have the least neighborhood resources."

Think of it. The Capital of the richest nation in the world cannot afford 27-cent meals for its hungry schoolchildren. Presumably if the public doesn't provide this charity handout of $1,350 a week—and keep on contributing $1,350 a week—nearly 1,000 school tots will attend afternoon classes with their bellies empty.

There, surely, is something we Americans can be proud of. There is something we can be smug about when we look down our noses at Russia's "regimented schools." We invented the atomic bomb and we have put four satellites into orbit, but we cannot figure out a way to afford 27 cents a day to keep a little schoolchild from going hungry.

We want, of course, as do scores of thousands of parents, to see both the milk and the lunch programs made available to all 138,000 schools and the 3 cents a half-pint charge eliminated. Looking to the future, the labor movement, I am sure, would support the idea of free vitamin pills for students in whom nutritional deficiencies had been detected.

Finally, we of labor, both as members of a militantly reformist organization and also as parents, are concerned about curriculum and about the quality of instruction.

We are deeply apprehensive about the appalling extent to which Soviet Russia has outstripped us—and according to Government sources is still outstripping us—in the training of highly skilled technical workers and scientists. It is tragic that we become concerned about our educational lag only when our very survival is threatened. As one writer put it recently, "Only with sputnik did our educational plant begin to be seriously looked at. We start worrying about brains only when we get ready to blow them out."

Obviously we need more vocational training, more technical training and—the experts tell us—a major revamping of science teaching in both elementary and secondary schools. These, together with a vastly expanded scholarship program, are absolute necessities if we are to meet the challenge of the space age and the atomic era. They are necessary if we are to preserve our freedoms, our way of life, our valuation of the dignity of man from the mounting menace of totalitarianism.

But at the same time we of labor are anxious that teaching of the humanities not be neglected. In the final analysis, the fine arts and the liberal arts together with the spiritual values of our Judao-Christian tradition constitute the true core of our civilization. The brave new world we seek is not just one centered on our conquest of space and the systematic achievement of new scientific marvels. It must be a world, also, in which man can enjoy a richer life of the intellect, a world of inner growth, a world of new intellectual, esthetic, and spiritual discovery.

WHAT ORGANIZED LABOR CAN DO

A favorite quotation at teachers' conventions is the statement by Robert Hutchins, former president of the University of Chicago, that, "We do not know what education could do for us, because we have never tried it."

When I am asked "how organized labor can help improve public education," I am almost tempted to reply that "We do not know * * * because we have never tried it."

However, that wouldn't be wholly accurate. We have tried it and are trying it, to a limited extent. True, some communities—or rather the status quo minded leaders of some communities—have in years past deliberately blocked labor out from any participation on or with boards of education and prohibited any cooperation or joint programs by school officials and local labor bodies.

To a large extent, however, that picture has changed and is continuing to change, as part of a major transformation in the majority of progressive American communities. Not too many years back, as recently in fact as the years immediately prior to World War II, organized labor was strictly on the outside looking in with community chests, Red Cross chapters and virtually all social agencies.

Today organized labor is not just welcomed on the boards of directors of community chests, united funds, and other agencies. Labor's participation in the governing councils of these agencies is sought and solicited, and frequently considered indispensable. As a result, because labor has been accepted as a full-fledged partner, joining in the policymaking and sharing in the decisions, fund-raising campaigns have been successful as never before.

I believe the same process is currently under way in the Nation's educational systems. A generation ago, even two decades ago, a representative of organized labor on a school board was virtually unheard of. Today there are hundreds of unionists—either elected or appointed—on the school boards of big cities, small cities, and towns. And more and more union people are offering themselves as candidates for boards of education with every passing year.

School boards have benefited, even been enriched, by labor's participation, by the involvment of men and women representing the largest section of citizenry, wage earners and their families. School boards have been strengthened and revitalized by the inclusion of labor representatives with fresh vigorous viewpoints and with the militancy to set challenging new goals and achieve them.

But specifically now, what can organized labor do to help improve public education?

I am partisan, of course, but I think that organized labor, to one extent or another, can help find the solution to every problem that public education faces today. More than that, I am certain that organized labor can contribute more to the solution of some problems than any other section or group in our society.

Let me list, as concisely as I can, the things I think organized labor can do—and probably is already doing—today to help improve public education:

1. The labor movement can throw its strongest possible support behind the enactment by Congress of Federal legislation to assist new school construction, to facilitate the employment of more teachers, and to help raise teachers' pay scales.

2. The labor movement can push for the same objectives—new schools, more teachers and better-paid teachers—in State legislatures and city councils.

3. The labor movement can support, morally, organizationally, and financially, the election of Members of Congress, members of State legislatures, and members of city councils wholeheartedly committed to clear-cut programs for the improvement of public education.

4. The labor movement can help communities and school boards raise funds for new school construction and for current operating expenses by insisting on replacement of the present antiquated tax structure in which nearly 80 percent of all school revenue comes from property taxes with a new structure erected on a broader base in corporate and personal income taxes.

5. The labor movement can help communities and school boards raise funds for new construction by giving active support to the approval of school bond issues or equitable new local taxes.

6. The labor movement, for the purpose of launching school improvement programs, can use its influence to combine into one overall, coordinating group such organizations as parent-teacher associations, civic leagues, private welfare agencies, fraternal societies, religious bodies, citizens associations, and neighborhood groups.

7. The labor movement can support the efforts of school boards and educational societies to establish higher professional standards for teachers.

8. The labor movement can encourage and aid teachers in the formation of their own unions when and where they wish and to enjoy both the right and the benefits of collective bargaining.

9. The labor movement can help protect teachers against investigative hysteria and witch hunts, against unneeded and stupid loyalty oaths and against wholesale smear attacks by reactionary officials and superpatriotic outfits.

10. The labor movement can help make the teaching profession and, particularly, positions in local school systems more attractive by pushing for improved teacher-retirement programs and health insurance plans.

11. The labor movement can help local school boards combat the false "economy" programs and ruinous pennypinching fiscal policies of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, its local affiliates and manufacturers' associations.

12. The labor movement can champion the cause of full academic freedom and democratic rights within the school system and in the community.

13. The labor movement can throw its weight behind State legislation and local laws raising the age levels for compulsory school attendance.

14. The labor movement can—both alone and in concert with other organizations—fight for the swift and complete eradication of segregation and Jim Crow in the Nation's schools.

15. The labor movement can campaign for free milk programs and free lunch programs in communities or in individual schools where they do not exist and where they are needed.

16. The labor movement can join with other organizations in demanding free immunization and other preventive medicine programs for schoolchildren plus X-rays and periodic eye, ear, throat, and dental examinations.

17. The labor movement can enlarge and diversify its own growing scholarship programs.

18. The labor movement can help lead community efforts to establish specialized educational programs for both gifted and retarded children.

These, let me repeat, are not simply 18 goals which the labor movement has projected for itself. They are 18 areas of political and economic action in which organized labor has been devoting time and effort in varying degrees and for varying numbers of years. In some of these 18 areas labor's efforts date back more than 100 years; other undertakings, such as labor's own scholarship programs, are of more recent vintage.

Let us examine a few of these 18 goals in terms of why they are goals and what problems they present, from labor's point of view.

Legislation: A week ago today you as members of school boards and as educators suffered a disheartening blow. President Eisenhower's budget message contained no recommendations of any kind for public school construction. The youth of the Nation and an increasingly dilapidated educational system are to be sacrificed to the fetish of a balanced budget.

This deliberate ignoring and bypassing of one of the most urgent needs in our society today would be criminal by itself, but it becomes doubly so in view of the administration's failure to propose any school construction program last year. In 1956 and 1957 the White House gave at least lipservice to pending school construction bills, which eventually were smothered in the House of Representatives.

For 4 years, therefore, we have bemoaned and deplored the mounting crisis, the double shifts, classes in corridors and boilerrooms, half-day sessions and firetrap buildings; but not a scrap of legislation has come out of Congress.

The labor movement is angry about this, I can assure you, and we intend to translate that anger into action. We have already given our strongest possible endorsement to the Murray-Metcalf bill which would appropriate $1.1 billion the first year and $11.4 billion over a 4-year period for new school construction and teachers' salaries. That $1.1 billion for the first year, labor has pointed out, equals the cost of just 10 days of fighting the cold war as measured by current defense appropriations.

We are happy to see that the National Education Association and numerous teachers' organizations have also endorsed the Murray-Metcalf measure, but it's obvious that we have to do a good deal more than merely issue endorsements.

To begin with, the administration doesn't want it. The Democrats in Congress don't have it, as yet, on their "must legislation" list. And the pro-Eisenhower Scripps-Howard newspapers flatly predict that if the Democrats pass the Murray-Metcalf bill that the President will veto it.

So endorsements aren't going to suffice if we want to take our children out of the corridors and boilerrooms, out of half-day sessions, and out of frightening firetraps.

We're going to have to campaign strongly and loudly for this legislation; we're going to have to move on Capitol Hill and talk cold turkey with Members of Congress; we're going to have to prove to them we're deadly serious about the Murray-Metcalf bill; we're going to have to tell Representatives and Senators bluntly that when they come up for relection labor will remember what action they took or failed to take on school construction and teachers' salaries. In short, we're going to have to be more than just determined; we're going to have to be tough. We must insist on passage of the Murray-Metcalf bill and its enactment over President Eisenhower's veto if he has the temerity to turn it down.

Realistically, how much can you depend upon labor's influence in Congress to help you? To answer that, I must say first that labor is, quite naturally, proud of the success of its efforts in the November elections. The New York Times tells us that we batted 700 percent; in short, 7 out of every 10 candidates endorsed by labor were elected, a percentage never before achieved by the labor movement. But I suggest, for your own sanity, that you not join Senator BARRY GOLDWATER and the group of reactionary newspaper columnists who were thrown into a state of shock on November 4 and have been moaning ever since that the Nation is already entrapped in a "laboristic" economy.

We are a long, long way from any such thing. Nevertheless, we of labor, and you as members of school boards, can take satisfaction in such achievements at the polls last November 4 as the following:

1. Of the 62 new Democratic Members of the House of Representatives whom we helped elect, at least 50 will support Federal funds for school construction and teachers' salaries. In addition, 15 of the 16 new Senators are, in labor's book, more liberal than their predecessors and more likely to vote for school legislation.

2. We have greatly improved the legislative chances of such proposals as the Murray-Metcalf bill by adding five new liberals to the crucial House Labor and Education Committee. Gone from Congress will be those perennial roadblocks to school legislation: Senator William Jenner, of Indiana, and Representative Ralph Gwinn, of New York.

3. We also elected last November 4 a larger number of liberal Governors—16 out of 22 whom we endorsed—and liberal State legislators who we have reason to expect will put our children's education on a higher level of urgency than the balancing of budgets.

On this question of elections and legislation, I would not want to leave you with the impression that the labor movement distrusts the Republican Party where school legislation is concerned. Let me simply say, instead, that we of labor understand that bright new San Francisco satirist, Mort Sahl, when he recently offered the following political definition: "A conservative Republican is a man who contends that nothing new should ever be tried; a modern Republican says it should, but not now."

Taxes: Many school boards and school board members feel that local and State tax programs are the crux of our problem of financing new schools and improved teachers salaries. We of labor contend—and so do many of you—that this problem will continue to plague us as long as we attempt to operate an expanded 1959 school system under a 1925 tax structure. Nearly 80 percent of all school revenue today, as I have pointed out, comes from property tax, and as a result property owners are paying a disproportionate share. But huge corporate and personal incomes have been grossly overlooked as a source of new taxes for school purposes.

But there are other tax sources, too. In Maryland, where I vote, teachers' organizations waged a superb campaign last year for a cigarette tax which was enacted over a Republican Governor's veto and which provided a $400 salary increase for the State's teachers. The teachers are back again this year, having helped elect a Democratic Governor avowedly more sympathetic to their cause, determined to win another $400 hike, new salary minimums, smaller classes, and expansion of teachers' colleges. By taking a page from labor's book—by lobbying, campaigning and buttonholing—the teachers got commitments to their program from more than half the candidates for the State legislature.

You as school board members and leaders, have, almost invariably, an ally in organized labor whenever you plan, or submit to referendum vote, a municipal bond issue to finance new school construction. We can cite scores of instances in recent years in which local and State labor bodies carried the brunt of the work, including house-to-house canvassing, in successful referendum campaigns for school bond issues.

Those of you who have worked with organized labor in such campaigns know the vigor, the enthusiasm and the determination that union members and leaders bring to such civic efforts.

Other benefits for teachers: The labor movement, today as in the past, fights for other economic gains which—although designed to benefit all American wage earners—will also serve to make the teaching profession more attractive for newcomers and retain in the profession teachers who might otherwise be inclined to leave.

Such, for example, are health insurance programs which relieve underpaid teachers of the constantly nagging fear of catastrophic illness or accident. In many communities organized labor's efforts, combined with those of other groups, have won both health insurance and dental care plans for teachers.

In the same fashion, organized labor has battled, and still battles, for improved retirement plans, pension benefits and social security payments for teachers and others. Numerous surveys have found that one of the major reasons for teachers leaving their profession in the past has been the fear of impoverished old age following retirement, fear of becoming dependent on charity.

Of similar nature and purpose is organized labor's most recently undertaken campaign—to add a broad medical care program to the social security system. This proposal, reflecting as it does a desperate need, has become the AFL–CIO's prime objective in the welfare field.

Already in Congress bills, supported by labor, have been introduced to provide social security pensioners up to 60 days a year of free hospital care, nursing home care ranging up to 120 days, as well as payment for a variety of surgical costs.

This plan would cover nearly 13,000,000 Americans, including not only retired workers over 65 but employees who have continued on the job beyond that age.

Here again organized labor knows that underpaid teachers would be given an extra incentive to remain in their chosen profession if they knew they had available these additional benefits and protections that wouldn't pauperize them in their old age.

But this splendid program will not be won without a tremendous struggle; we know that because business and employer organizations and especially the reactionary and inhumane American Medical Association have already declared war on the proposal.

Here certainly is another field in which teachers, educators and school board members can cooperate in a common cause for the benefit of teachers and the community as a whole.

Raising compulsory attendance minimums: There has been, recently, a renewed upsurge of public sentiment to raise the minimum age for compulsory school attendance. This upsurge was reflected in President Eisenhowers almost-too-casual remark last December 16 that he favored adding another year or two to the present high school term. He did not, however, follow his idea to its logical conclusion by proposing an increase in the compulsory schooling ages.

Here again, I believe, is an area in which school boards, teachers and the labor movement agree and can, therefore, combine for effective action. Our agreement is on two scores: First, that there should be some kind of national standard on the minimum age for compulsory education, and, second, that there should be a general tightening up of State laws providing for work permits for children below the compulsory attendance age.

The considerable variation among State compulsory education laws dictates the necessity of a national standard. Today 39 States require students to attend school through age 16, 4 States require attendance through 17, and 5 States through age 18.

We of labor would like to see the 18-year minimum become nationwide, not simply because it is socially desirable and will produce a more comprehensively educated Nation, but also because extended education—extended both in quantity and in quality—is an absolute necessity in this era of cold war.

We are, of course, gratified that the National Education Association agrees with us on this. The NEA proposes not only the 18-year minimum for compulsory schooling but also a 16-year minimum for work permits. To this we give a hearty amen.

Not only the variations in State laws on the question of work permits for children but also the variations in the vigor with which these laws are administered is a cause for concern to labor and educators. Work permits for school-age children should certainly not be as easy to obtain as they are in some States. In almost every instance both the laws and their administration should be drastically tightened. To labor's point of view, and to the point of view of most teachers, there can be absolutely no excuse, no justification for the wholesale release of children from school in some States to work, for weeks at a time, in fields during the harvesting season. We know and you know of utterly disgraceful instances in which authorities have permitted the complete closing down of entire school systems during harvesting periods.

Here, in cases like this, one of the prime purposes of compulsory education is defeated. Child labor and the exploitation of schoolchildren by our "factories in the fields" are not, as many people wishfully believe, a matter of the past.

The importance of the compulsory element in American education cannot, we believe, be overestimated. The value of free education is manifestly undermined if shortsighted parents or pressing economic need force children of school age into farm, factory, or any other kind of jobs.

James Russell Lowell understood this fact when he declared:

"It was in making education not only common to all, but in some sense compulsory on all, that the destiny of the free republics of America was practically settled."

As we all know today, the contemporary problem doesn't end with primary and secondary education. More and more today a college education becomes a necessity, both from the individual's standpoint and from society's standpoint. Yet college becomes a remote aspiration for an increasing number of high school students, due to constantly rising tuition fees and other expenses. Each year at least 100,000 students who graduate in the upper third of their class find it financially impossible to continue their education in college.

For those reasons, the labor movement advocates the establishment of more State and municipal colleges and universities with minimal tuition fees. I think it would be safe to predict, incidentally, that eventually the labor movement will advocate free college education for those who want it and are qualified for it. Again, this, too, would be a measure designed not simply for the benefit of the wage earners' families, but for the benefit of our society as a whole.

Loyalty oaths: There are, I realize, divisions within and among school boards on the question of loyalty oaths. Teachers, however, and organized labor, too, are much closer to unanimity in opposing these requirements, which time and again have proved (1) wholly unneeded, (2) costly to administer, (3) futile in achieving their objective of unmasking subversives.

These three points, in fact, were made just last month by Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Flemming in expressing his disillusion with the loyalty-oath clause in the National Defense Education Act of 1958. Both the Association of American Colleges and the 40,000-member American Association of University Professors have taken stands against this loyalty-oath provision as, among other things, a serious threat to academic freedom. With few exceptions, this is the attitude of the teaching profession generally toward loyalty oaths—city, State, or Federal.

The danger in the loyalty-oath atmosphere is the hysteria and the vigilante mentality that it helps generate.

Let me cite just one example. A little while ago Lt. Gov. A. E. Stephens, of Virginia, unloosed a vicious and barbaric attack on public school teachers in his State who failed to sign up with a private makeshift education program, as the Associated Press called it.

Because a group of Virginia teachers refused to surrender their intelligence and integrity to the Byrd machine's stultifying legal hodgepodge of "massive resistance"—which just last week was annihilated by State and Federal courts—this mountebank Stephens accused them of disloyalty. Said Stephens: "When you pick up a newspaper and see that a large body of teachers has voted not to participate in a private school movement, you ask yourself, 'Where is their loyalty?'"

Well, I'll tell this Neanderthal where their loyalty is. Their loyalty is to the children of Virginia, to the helpless victims of the primitive, semicivilized prejudices and bigotries of their elders. Their loyalty is to our Nation's future, to its security and progress, and to the happiness of the generations to come. Their loyalty is to the ideals of democracy, decency, and human dignity. Their loyalty is to the tradition of Thomas Jefferson who told his fellow-Virginians in 1787, "Educate and inform the whole mass of the people. They are the only sure reliance for the preservation of our liberty"—the same Thomas Jefferson on whom Stephens and his bankrupt ilk turn their backs today. Their loyalty is to the integrity of their profession and to the honor of their academic calling. Their loyalty is to self-respect and to the pride of free men and women contributing to the future of a free world.

Here, therefore, is another area in which teachers and those responsible for our schools can join in common cause with organized labor. Certainly neither you nor organized labor want to stand cowardly and cravenly silent while a political primitive like Stephens indicts thousands of teachers—and the entire profession by implication—of disloyalty. It is Stephens, of course, who is disloyal—disloyal to the 20th century.

What I am saying, in short, is that you as school board members and we as union members whose children attend schools have a joint responsibility to defend our teachers and the teaching profession from stupid smears and blackguarding slanders that pour from the mouths of intellectual cavemen.

The issue of local control: I have noted that the National School Boards Association, or at least part of its leadership, is engaged in a running polemic on the question of what is termed "local control" of schools.

Local control is, of course, sometimes a scare word. It equates in some instances—not all—with "States rights"—another scare word that has produced one of the most shameful situations in our Nation's history, the closure of public schools.

Local control and "States rights" have resulted today in 10,000 D.P.'s in Virginia.

No, I'm not referring to that mass wartime tragedy: Displaced persons. I'm referring to that mass peacetime tragedy: "Displaced pupils."

And "displaced pupils" is where "local control" and "States rights"—taken to their horrendous extremes—have ended up.

Let's make no mistake about this. We of labor like and prefer local control. We want and insist upon the greatest possible diffusion of democracy, the greatest possible amount of self-government in the hands of the people, the mass of the people, the Nation's wage earners. That has been labor's position since the birth of our Republic.

But let's make no mistake about this, either. When local control, when State control, breaks down, proves inadequate to social and economic needs, then we of labor are not going to oppose Federal intervention. On the contrary, we're going to insist on it.

We call it "the crisis in education" today. It's not. It's a crisis in our society, a crisis for us as parents, a crisis across State lines, a crisis for us as a civilization fighting for survival.

So I am not terribly impressed when one of your spokesmen singles out Admiral Rickover as a chief villain of the piece.

Admiral Rickover is quoted in one of your recent NSBA leaflets as saying that "the greatest single obstacle" to educational improvement in the United States "lies in the fact that the control and financing of schools is in the hands of thousands of school boards."

Perhaps I don't agree and perhaps the labor movement doesn't agree, but you would be sadly deluding yourselves if you assumed that the only criticism of investing full power in local school boards comes from the Rickovers or from those—and there are very few of them—who seek full concentration of powers in a Federal agency.

We of organized labor—who seek to become allies and partners of school boards—are critical in community after community of the inertia and apathy of school boards to the urgency of your problem. It's an open secret that your own conventions are privately disturbed by this inertia and apathy, on issue after issue.

Let me repeat that we of labor would love to see all your local school problems, financing of new construction, teachers' salaries, integration of local schools and everything else, all solved on a local level.

But the most obvious thing in the world—proved a hundred times over in the last two generations—is that your local school boards can't solve your problems without Federal help; and you are not going to have Federal help without some degree of Federal influence or control. We of labor and, I suspect, the general public are going to lose patience—we are already losing patience—with cheap evasions by "States rights" and "local control" fanatics of their responsibilities to the education of our children and the generations to come.

Your own thinking has changed. Gradually as you have become reconciled to Federal financial help you have had to reconcile yourself to Federal responsibility. Let's face it. Your organization, your mental temper and atmosphere, is less isolationist than before. You need and you depend on—and you admit it—the help of the Nation in a crisis. If you live in some States you are asking for financial help from the taxpayers of other States.

In some States your educational systems can't survive without Federal help.

Therefore, we of labor suggest that you recommend to local school boards that they stop yawping about the raping of "States rights" until they can finance their own "States rights" school systems in terms of U.S. Supreme Court and State court decisions. We dislike, and I think you dislike, a privileged school system, a school system that discriminates against democracy and in favor of Senator HARRY BYRD's bigotry and in favor of the White Citizens Councils and in favor of the Ku Klux Klan and in favor of bombings of schools in Clinton, Tenn., and Osage, W. Va.

We of labor, as you know, are intense admirers of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Yet we have been critical of F.D.R. when once in a while he fumbled the ball.

In the depression years almost everything F.D.R. proposed appeared attractive to labor, but in August 1933 Robert Hutchins proposed that some kind of help be given to young people who wanted to go to college. F.D.R. said, "Frankly the objections are pretty serious because it would start the Government on a policy of paying for education, which has always been a State and local matter. The chances are 10 to 1 that we won't do anything in the way of sending boys and girls to college."

But as the depression deepened and deepened, Roosevelt waited and waited for the States and the cities and the counties to do something. Most of them couldn't; some of them wouldn't. So, in 1935 F.D.R. established the National Youth Administration and within a year more than 400,000 students were receiving Federal benefits—benefits and an education they could never receive anywhere else, certainly not from industry and business that were opposed to the very idea.

Those girls and boys, who got an educational break under the NYA in 1935 and subsequent years, are, in many cases, the men and women teaching our children today. Don't we have a similar obligation to their children and ours today?

We of labor might ask a final question on this absurd issue of "local control" and "States rights." Did the GI bill of rights—after World War II or Korea—undermine local control or States rights? Of course not.

More and more, as I have said, union representatives are being elected or appointed to school boards. If you, as school board heads and members, will welcome them and work with them on your common problems, you can be sure that the issue of "local control" and "States rights" will be worked out amicably, peacefully, and swiftly.

I am sure that I have been invited to address you because you wanted a representative of organized labor to be blunt and even contentious. Therefore, I won't disappoint you.

The labor movement wants to help the National School Boards Association toward its goals. In fact, the labor movement has been supporting the NSBA goals even before the origin of your organization. We would like a reciprocal arrangement.

Your organization has adopted a formal "Statement of Beliefs and Policies," adopted in 1955 and confirmed by your 1956 convention. Point 6 of this 24-point program declares that your organization "believes that, in the making of policies, wisdom would indicate that individuals and groups who will be affected by a given policy should be consulted by the Board of Education during the formulative period and should be fully informed concerning the policy finally adopted." And your "Statement of Beliefs and Policies" ends with this pregnant statement: "Those who share will care."

Let us take your point 6 at its face value. I believe that point 6 requires you, as school board members, to recognize—even to encourage—the union organization of your teachers. The American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO, for a quarter-century and more, has been organizing and cooperating with many school boards in their struggle for larger school appropriations—in Federal and State budgets.

But this isn't only a question of union organization. Because we of labor are concerned also with the education of our children, we know that there should be closer contact between school boards and teachers.

For example, we have known for a long time what was discovered last month in a survey by the University of Maryland, a survey financed by the Southern Regional Education Board. Among other findings, this survey established "There is an abyss between the teacher and the administrator across which neither can communicate his feelings, ideas, and problems."

It is that human relations gap that union organization, the American Federation of Teachers, AFL–CIO, can fill and has filled. What you seek and what we in the labor movement seek—in final analysis—is a better educational system, and a better educational system depends entirely on teachers, their training, their pay, their job security, their chance of doing the wonderful things they want to do for children—and the money to finance these goals.

The future of our country is in your hands, in the hands of your school boards, because you are deciding today and tomorrow the quality and quantity of our children's education.

You and the labor movement understand the urgency of our times because, as we know in the words of H. G. Wells:

"Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe."

WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN PROBLEMS—REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems be authorized to submit its final report to the Secretary of the Senate during the recess of the Senate in order to comply with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 172.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF ALBERT GALLATIN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today is a day of special importance to Americans of Swiss descent, and it is an anniversary with a special meaning for all Americans today.

January 29 is the anniversary of the birth of Albert Gallatin, an American patriot in our Nation's struggle for independence and later a brilliant Secretary of the Treasury under President Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. Gallatin was born in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1761. As a young man of 19, he sensed that greater opportunities could be found in a new nation struggling for independence, and so he came to America and threw in his lot with the American patriots. In this much of his career, he is typical of millions of brave, ambitious, and forward-looking young men who have come from far shores to find new opportunities in the United States of America—and who contributed immeasurably to the strength and vitality of this Nation.

But Mr. Gallatin's career was marked by even more extraordinary achievements. After the Revolution, he entered a political career and was successively a Pennsylvania State legislator, Representative, Senator, Secretary of the Treasury, and Ambassador to Great Britain and France.

One of the causes to which he dedicated much of his life's effort still has tremendous meaning to us today. That cause is the promotion of sound commercial relations with foreign nations throughout the world, and it is a cause which is even more vital to our Nation in our day than it was in Albert Gallatin's.

"It is commerce which unites the nations of the civilized world. It is principally to commerce that we are indebted for modern civilization," Gallatin once said.

To this statement we might add today, it is to commerce that we shall be indebted for the survival of modern civilization.

Only a few days ago, the Premier of the Soviet Union sounded a tremendous challenge to the United States and the free world. He claimed that the Soviet Union would surpass the United States in economic production in 6 years. All thoughtful Americans now recognize that this challenge must be met, and all will recognize that only greatly expanded international commerce, supplementing an expanding domestic trade, can enable this Nation to stay ahead of the Communist world.

This is a tremendous job for the entire free world. Fortunately, it is a job which the entire free world has recognized. Even though Albert Gallatin could not have foreseen the form of the challenge, he has provided a set of principles which have significance to it, even today.

It is an honor for me, therefore, to join Swiss-Americans in Wisconsin and throughout the United States who celebrate Albert Gallatin's influence on the early formation of our democratic institutions, and his lasting contributions to our political philosophy. Wisconsin has always been proud of its citizens of Swiss descent, not only for their wonderful cheese, which has won worldwide fame for our State, but for their sound and lasting influence on the development of our State.

REPORT OF THE CHIEF JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF THE SEVERAL STATES

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, on January 12, 1959, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, there was printed a resolution and a report issued by the Conference of Chief Justices of the Supreme Courts of the several States held as Pasadena, Calif., on August 23, 1958. The resolution is on approval of the voluminous report made by the committee on Federal-State relationships, which report, in part, is highly critical of the Supreme Court of the United States. This committee of the conference undoubtedly acted with the same sincerity it ascribes to the Supreme Court Judges with whom the committee members disagree. With equal sincerity there were present those who disagreed with the propriety of the report and resolution.

At the suggestion of Chief Justice Jones of Pennsylvania the resolution was submitted to the "ayes and nays" of the conference, and 8 nays were recorded against 36 ayes.

Chief Justice Francis B. Condon of the Supreme Court of the State of Rhode Island supported the suggestion of the chief justice from Pennsylvania. His reasons behind this support seem to me to be well taken, and I ask unanimous consent to have them printed as a part of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF CHIEF JUSTICE FRANCIS B. CONDON, OF RHODE ISLAND, ON THE RESOLUTION INTRODUCED BY THE COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL-STATE RELATIONSHIPS AS AFFECTED BY JUDICIAL DECISIONS AT THE CONFERENCE OF CHIEF JUSTICES IN PASADENA, CALIF., AUGUST 23, 1958

Chief Justice DETHMERS. For the purpose of speaking in opposition to the resolution, the Chair recognizes Chief Justice Condon of Rhode Island.

Chief Justice CONDON. I profoundly regret that this body did not adopt the motion by Chief Justice Jones. I intended to make that motion myself.

The first time I saw this report was on the first day of this conference. I assume that practically all of the members saw this report for the first time that day. That report covers a great deal. It ought to receive, it seems to me, the same mature deliberation which the members of this court in the discharge of their judicial duties give to the briefs presented in the most ordinary case that comes before the court. We have not had that opportunity.

I have not read the report since it was read by Mr. Chief Justice Brune, but I must confess, gentlemen, that I would like more time to consider it. What are we doing? Forty-eight chief justices of the State supreme courts are sitting here in a brief conference and undertaking to disapprove of and condemn the actions of nine Justices of the highest Court in this Republic. What right have we to condemn them? What right have we to disapprove of the manner in which they have discharged their duties? Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I question whether this conference has the right under our articles of organization to adopt such a report. This is a consultative organization.

It is not an organization to sit in judgment upon the conduct of any State officers of any of our several States, nor indeed is it an organization to sit in judgment upon the highest Court in the land. And so, Mr. Chairman, I have asked for these few moments here this morning in order that I might explain my vote.

I do not intend to support this resolution. I do not intend to support it because, as our chairman of group 3 said: "Everything in the report is incorporated in the resolution by reference." So, when you vote to pass this resolution, you vote to approve every single paragraph in that report, and I, for one, do not care to be recorded in that manner. Therefore, I subscribe to the suggestion made by Mr. Chief Justice Jones of Pennsylvania that when the vote is taken on this resolution, it shall be by ayes and nays so that each of us shall have an opportunity to record his stand, and it will be a matter of public record.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I had the pleasure some days ago to join with our most able majority leader (Mr. Johnson of Texas) in the introduction of a civil rights bill. Last year I joined with the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] in the introduction of his civil rights bill, and will do so again this Congress.

As chairman of the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, I hope that the Senate will pass a constructive civil rights bill which meets the approval of a substantial majority of the American people. On January 28, 1959, there appeared in the Washington Post a column by Mr. Roscoe Drummond, entitled "JOHNSON and Civil Rights." I believe that Mr. Drummond has made some very constructive comments respecting the bill sponsored by the senior Senator from Texas and myself. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Drummond's column be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHNSON AND CIVIL RIGHTS—CONCILIATION PLAN APPROVED

(By Roscoe Drummond)

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, the majority leader, is offering the Senate an honest and significant piece of civil-rights legislation.

Besides giving the Justice Department further power to deal with denial of voting rights, its new feature is the proposal to create a community conciliation service—somewhat parallel to the Federal Mediation Service for labor disputes—to further compliance with all civil-rights laws including public school integration.

This may not be the only useful step which could be taken at this time, but it faces in the right direction. It is positive, not negative. It doesn't merely threaten those who withhold civil rights from minorities; it aims to bring civil rights into being for more citizens.

What may be even more commendable is that the proposed civil rights conciliation agency has won the instant scorn of the extremists on both sides—those who don't want anything done ever and those who want everything done at once.

One misplaced criticism of the conciliation proposal is that it amounts to conciliating whether the law should be observed.

That certainly sounds like a blockbuster of a moral argument, but when you examine it I doubt if it is much stronger than a cap pistol under water.

Federal labor law makes collective bargaining mandatory. But it is no denial of the law to have a Federal Mediation Service to promote the faithful use of collective bargaining. It's the same with civil rights.

It is quite proper to try to punish those who have deprived others of their voting rights or other civil rights. But it isn't inconsistent to take steps to enable more citizens to possess their voting rights and other civil rights where community resistance has denied those rights.

A civil rights conciliation agency would not conciliate whether the law should be observed; it would conciliate ways to bring about observance. Is that bad? Is that compromising with the devil? It seems to me that it is good—and wise and realistic.

I'm not against punishing the civil rights depriver; but what is more important is to increase the civil rights users and that is why the Johnson measure is refreshingly positive and constructive.

The conciliation service would apply to the whole range of civil rights—voting, public transportation, use of public parks and playgrounds, and public school integration. The Montgomery bus boycott would, for example, have been a good setting in which the conciliation agency could have worked. It would have most likely brought about earlier compliance with the law. Would it have been conciliating whether the law should be observed? No; it would have been conciliating ways to observe the law.

In public school integration the courts alone determine what the law is, but most judges recognize that the courts do not constitute the best means of working out the social, educational, political, and psychological questions bearing on how the law can best be applied with all deliberate speed.

In view of the latest decisions of the Federal courts and the Virginia State Supreme Court in which Virginia's own judges ruled all of Governor Almond's massive resistance laws unconstitutional, the time is almost at hand when legal means of avoiding the beginning of integration will be exhausted. This means that the time is near when Governors and legislatures will have to decide whether to obey the Supreme Court or resort to illegal means to defy it.

Question: If Government officials can decide which laws they will enforce, are they not teaching young people and adults alike that citizens can be free to decide which laws they will obey?

It will not be long before the civil rights conciliation agency will have large opportunities to help promote compliance.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF WILLIAM McKINLEY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, today I should like to remark the fact that this is the birth anniversary of William McKinley, former President of the United States.

When I was born, in January of 1896, a very fond and saintly father thought I should bear a very dignified moniker. So he gave me the name of EVERETT MCKINLEY DIRKSEN, and I have worn it with great pride ever since.

William McKinley was born in 1843. He had a distinguished record in the Civil War, served in a good many Congresses, and was elected to the Presidency in 1896. He was by all odds, I believe, one of the most gentle and able and forbearing persons who ever graced the White House in the history of this country.

In Columbus, Ohio, there is a statue—as I recall, it is just across from the Neil House—which pretty well marks the spot where, every morning, when William McKinley went to his law office, or even when, later, he went to his office as Governor of that great Commonwealth, he used to turn around and wave goodby to his invalid wife. I think the very fact that that spot is marked, the very fact that that great quality and attribute of spirit became so manifest to everyone, stems from one of the great moral attributes of the people of this country.

Mr. President, I did not want January 29 to pass without observing the significance of the date and also pointing out that whenever the House is in session on this day, it traditionally distributes carnations to every Member of the House in token of this event.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARTKE in the chair). The Senator from Illinois.

PROPOSED "ABOLITION" OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this is perhaps taking an advantage, but on two occasions recently—by the way, the whole plan has been spoiled now by the entry into the Chamber of the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana—on two occasions at the late end of the day, no Republican Members of the Senate were on the floor. It had been pretty well agreed that the session was over. On one occasion, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] was making an address on a proposed charter commission for the District of Columbia. On the second occasion the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] was making an address on disarmament. Only one other Member was present on the other side of the aisle. No Members were present on this side of the aisle, because the two Members on this side of the aisle who had been assigned to be present were on the telephone in the cloakroom.

At that time, the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] made the observation—and it was a very broad and all-inclusive one—that, under the circumstances, the Republican Party should be abolished. He reiterated that assertion on the second occasion.

My distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], has spoiled what I was about to say by walking into the Chamber at this moment, because I was about to observe that, under the circumstances, with so many world-shaking problems challenging and confronting the Senate of the United States, it would be a good occasion to observe that the majority should be abolished, even though I would qualify it by making certain exceptions.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—THE HOUSING BILL AND THE AIRPORT BILL—AUTHORIZATION FOR BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE TO MEET ON MONDAY DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in a moment I should like to make a comment on the President's agricultural message. But at this time I should like to query the majority leader about the program, in particular reference to the housing bill which will come before us.

So, Mr. President, I should like to ask the majority leader, pursuant to a conversation we had, what the plan is with respect to next week, and, very particularly, the housing bill and the airport bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, neither of those bills has been reported by the respective committees having them under consideration.

I am informed that the Banking and Currency Committee plans to meet tomorrow to consider and to mark up the housing bill; and I am hopeful that, if not this week, certainly by Monday the committee can report that bill.

If that is true, and if it meets with the pleasure of the Senate, I should like to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of the housing bill as early as possible; and the earliest I can anticipate would be Tuesday morning.

I shall be glad to have the Senate convene early and remain in session late, for as long as necessary, in order to see to it that action is taken on that bill, because some emergency matters are dealt with in it; and I do not wish to see the Senators leave for Lincoln Week, and the Senate be out of session for a week, with important legislation of that sort pending.

So if it is agreeable to the distinguished minority leader and to the other Members of the Senate, I would propose that if the committee reports the bill and has it on the calendar, ready for action, on, let us say, Monday, the Senate take it up on Tuesday, and continue with its consideration until all action on it is completed; and I would certainly hope that that could be done by Friday. If not, we could have a Saturday session.

I have talked to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPARKMAN], and to the distinguished chairman of the full committee, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. I believe they anticipate being able to have the bill on the calendar by Monday, with the hearings printed and the report available. I believe they are ready and willing to stay on the floor until the Senate can act on that proposed legislation; and I believe it is extremely important that the Senate act on it before we leave for Lincoln Week.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the majority leader will permit a comment, I did discuss the matter with the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. He did not apprehend it would take too long—perhaps a few days, at the outside—to dispose of the bill. He believed also that the markup could be completed by Monday; certainly not later than Tuesday. So other things being equal, there appears to be no objection to the consideration of the bill, in the hope that it can be disposed of next week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is that agreeable to the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Arkansas,

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, this matter was discussed, much as has been outlined.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I certainly believe we can mark up the bill not later than Monday. The chairman of the full committee has indicated he would be willing to meet that morning and stay as long as necessary, and, if required, would ask permission for an afternoon session, in addition to the meeting tomorrow. I believe the markup will be completed by Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may be permitted to meet on Monday, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate will be in session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY NEXT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns today it stand in adjournment until Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RELIGIOUS ACTION IN THE SOCIAL AND CIVIL ORDER

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, a few days ago the Honorable C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, spoke before the Foundation for Religious Action in the Social and Civil Order.

As one might expect from this distinguished son of New Jersey, his discussion of the imperatives of international economic growth was thoughtful and provocative. I should like particularly to call attention to his remarks on the need for making clear our national purpose in extending aid to other countries of the free world. He stated, in part:

I neither overlook nor minimize the dangers to this country inherent in masses of men and weapons, as well as technical and industrial resources, in the hands of an implacable Communist enemy. Without question, economic and technical assistance to the newly developing nations is in our national self-interest. However, we do ourselves a grave injustice and distort our true image before the world if we give our foreign-aid program a wholly selfish cast. For this program rests squarely in the great tradition of idealism that has motivated the American people since our earliest beginnings.

The Marshall plan, the point 4 program, and the present mutual security program have no parallel in all history. The willing acceptance by the American people of the challenge to help free other peoples from the bitter slavery of poverty is one of the greatest moral achievements of this century. We should not permit it to be derided by the cynical or deprecated by the uninformed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Mr. Dillon's speech be printed in the RECORD at this point and that following his speech there be printed an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann which appeared this morning which discusses the same matter and comments upon Mr. Dillon's speech.

There being no objection, the address and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPERATIVES OF INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC GROWTH

(Address by the Honorable C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, before the Foundation for Religious Action in the Social and Civil Order, Hotel Mayflower, Washington, D.C., January 16, 1959)

It is a distinct privilege to participate in FRASCO's fourth annual conference and to share this discussion of the imperatives of international economic development with so distinguished a Member of the Congress as Senator MONRONEY.

We have recently entered what promises to be a year of the highest drama. This fateful year is certain to produce formidable challenges to us as a nation, as a God-fearing people, and as freedom-loving citizens. Inevitably, many of 1959's problems will stem from the aggressive, expansionist ambitions of the leaders of the Sino-Soviet bloc.

There is no need for me to spell out here the full dimensions of international communism's military, economic and psychological threat to the free world. Many of you were among the first to recognize its total nature and its enormous implications for our way of life. And you, and the organizations you represent, were among the first to call for a many-sided response to this many sided challenge—a response which your Government is pressing forward on every front.

As you well know, Communist efforts in the economic field have been intensified in recent years. But I do not intend today to discuss the Sino-Soviet economic offensive. I want instead to examine with you the demand being made upon our resources and upon our consciences to help raise the living standards of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. These are the areas where most of mankind lives and where the struggle between freedom and totalitarianism may ultimately be decided. The need to help these peoples forward on the road to economic progress would confront us even if communism and the Sino-Soviet bloc simply didn't exist.

To me, the yearning of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America for a better way of life presents us with the ultimate challenge of our times—and our greatest hope for the future. It is clearly a moral challenge. If we fail to respond adequately, we shall stand accused as a people who proclaim our own satisfaction with the benefits of freedom, but who are slothful in carrying the spirit of freedom to others around the world. The plain fact is that our posture before the world can be no better than the manner in which we fulfill the obligations that flow from our status as the most materially favored nation in all history.

Our objective must be to help raise other peoples' standards of living. In so doing, we shall also help to raise standards of personal and political freedom—a goal which is impossible of achievement in the absence of economic growth. With these objectives in mind, let us consider the imperatives of international economic development:

The first imperative—and a major one—is to maintain a sturdy, growing economy in the United States. Our ability to extend aid, to offer the capital which is so badly needed in the newly emerging countries, is conditioned upon our domestic strength. Our prosperity also helps to assure them a market for their output. The movement of goods is, of course, closely related to the movement of capital. Not only must we import in order to export. We must import to keep investment flowing overseas. For without the prospect of returns, the expanding flow of private investment is impossible.

The second imperative—and one with which we must reckon increasingly as we continue to prosper—is the need to narrow the widening gap between living standards in the industrialized West and the underdeveloped nations. Ironically, while our own living standards and those of our allies in Europe are rapidly improving, living standards in the newly emerging nations are advancing much more slowly—due largely to the tremendous growth in population. Heroic efforts to narrow this gap must be made this year—not a decade hence, when it will be too late. We can be thankful that we are not alone in our recognition of this imperative. As they have emerged from the devastation of war, Britain, France, and Italy have been turning their attention increasingly to assisting the world's underdeveloped areas. Germany has recently entered this field with characteristic vigor, as have our neighbor, Canada, and other members of the British Commonwealth. So has Japan. The Japanese are now beginning to share their skills and resources with their neighbors.

But this gap cannot be closed by our efforts alone, nor even by the combined efforts of ourselves and our allies. The peoples of the newly emerging nations must make the major contribution to their own progress. I have visited many of these countries and talked to their leaders. A fresh wind is sweeping through them. Their peoples are no longer content to sit back and envy the more developed countries. They have been caught up in what has been aptly described as the revolution of rising expectations. Their leaders are desperately trying to meet these expectations. They need our help in their great effort.

Military security and internal stability must be present to provide the framework in which economic progress can take place at a steady and acceptable rate. Many of the newly emerging nations, especially in Asia and Africa, are plagued by the tensions inherent in the transition to new-found political independence. Our mutual security program has been of assistance in this respect, by making available equipment, training, and defense support for indigenous military and civil forces.

A third imperative is the maintenance of adequate markets on which the developing countries can place their goods. These countries must sell their products in order to obtain the industrial equipment needed for development. We have made significant strides toward keeping our market open to the surplus production of all countries of the free world through the extension of our Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act on a realistic, long-term basis. We are also working with other countries to expand trade through the operations of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. We must continue to pursue ways to remove artificial restraints upon world trade—our own and those imposed by others. Since many of the less developed countries now find their exports concentrated in a few primary commodities, we must stand ready to study ways to help avoid disastrous price fluctuations, and to assist them in diversifying their economies.

A fourth requirement for the newly emerging nations is the crying need for the technical and managerial skills which are the bedrock of development. Without them, no amount of capital will bring about growth. The United States has, over a period of years, made important contributions in this area: bilaterally, through our International Cooperation Administration, and multilaterally, through the United Nations and the Organization of American States. The need for technical skills is fully recognized by the developing nations themselves. For example, the recent annual report of the Colombo plan's consultative committee, said:

"In a year which has seen intensive consideration given to increasing the capital resources of leading lending institutions, it is now urgent that the less developed countries give greater attention to the development of the human skills which can assure the appropriate and effective utilization of these capital resources."

A fifth necessity is private investment. If we are to be of maximum help to less developed countries, our private resources—which are far larger than those Government can possibly provide—must be welcomed and drawn upon to the greatest extent possible. We are constantly seeking ways to stimulate the flow of private American investment abroad. The investment guaranty program of the ICA has been steadily expanding. Through tax treaties, through our system of credit for foreign income taxes paid, and through other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, the United States is endeavoring to avoid double taxation and thus facilitate American investment abroad. In our current tax treaty negotiations we have introduced an important innovation. We are preparing to give tax credit for certain income taxes waived by less developed countries as an inducement to investment, as if they had, in fact, been collected abroad. Currently, we are studying ways to ascertain how the Government can more effectively enlist the aid of private enterprise in achieving the objectives of our foreign policy. A group of distinguished citizens drawn from the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce, is now working actively on the preparation of concrete suggestions, and the President has stated his intention of submitting legislation on this subject to the Congress.

A sixth requirement is for public loans on normal bankable terms. Such loans are now being extended by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the International Monetary Fund. These organizations have a special virtue, for they draw on both the public and private resources of the entire free world. The United States has believed in, contributed to, and supported these agencies from the very beginning. The directors of these institutions, acting upon an American suggestion, have proposed to expand their resources. The United States also extends bankable loans for development through the Export-Import Bank, which has made an outstanding contribution to economic progress.

A seventh requirement is for development financing which will provide flexible terms of repayment. Many sound projects which are essential to development cannot qualify for bankable loans. It was to help finance such projects on a businesslike basis that the U.S. Congress established the Development Loan Fund. It works closely with our Export-Import Bank and with the World Bank to stimulate an increased flow of bankable loans for development programs. One of its objectives is to help stimulate private enterprise, which is so essential to the stability of the less developed areas.

In its first year of operation it has proved itself as a highly effective tool for economic development. It deserves your full and active support.

The United States is also working with its sister republics of the other Americas toward the establishment of an Inter-American financial institution. And we are suggesting the establishment of an International Development Association closely affiliated with the International Bank. Such an association would be a multilateral version of our own Development Loan Fund. It would provide a means whereby other countries able to do so could join in financing development projects. We are now actively examining the feasibility of such an institution with our friends and allies. This proposal, as many of you know, sprang originally from an imaginative concept of Senator MONRONEY, who has long been a leader in our Nation's efforts to aid the newly emerging peoples.

Now, I have been discussing the imperatives which depend heavily upon the initiatives and the resources of the more developed nations.

There are other imperatives of economic development which rest largely with the peoples of the underdeveloped nations themselves. I shall mention them briefly:

1. The need to create a climate in which foreign private investment can flourish.

2. The need to stimulate national savings so as to accumulate the domestic capital which is needed to insure stability and economic progress.

3. A willingness on the part of indigenous capital and business to welcome competition and assume risks normal to healthy free enterprise.

4. The reduction of traditional social and cultural barriers to economic progress, whether based upon class, race, or tradition.

5. The need to emphasize scientific, technical, financial, and commercial studies in their educational systems—plus a willingness on the part of the more talented individuals to seek training in skills directly related to economic progress, rather than to pursue education primarily as a means of enhancing social prestige.

These needs are rooted in problems based on attitudes, tradition, and established social patterns. They are resistant to change. They will not all be met tomorrow. But they must eventually be met if the newly emerging peoples are to make a successful transition to a state of steady economic growth.

Finally, I come to an imperative which is of crucial importance to this Nation. I refer to the need for redefining our national purpose in extending aid to other countries of the free world.

I sometimes wonder if we haven't fallen into a trap of our own making when, in seeking support for our mutual security program, we present it to the American people mainly as an answer to the menace of Communist aggression? We find that our motives are sometimes misunderstood abroad. I wonder if we haven't allowed ourselves to be identified in the eyes of large parts of the world as defenders of our own status quo—rather than as a people whose motivations are founded upon principle and whose response to the needs of others arises out of a deep sense of moral responsibility?

We must clearly establish the fact that all of our endeavors in the foreign aid field are designed as part of one common free world enterprise. We must consolidate a communion of interest with the aspiring peoples. I know of only one way to shape an image of integrity and responsibility. That is to exhibit integrity and responsibility. This we have most assuredly done. But perhaps we have allowed our good deeds to be obscured in the fog generated by our problems with the Soviet Union.

I neither overlook nor minimize the dangers to this country inherent in masses of men and weapons, as well as technical and industrial resources, in the hands of an implacable Communist enemy. Without question, economic and technical assistance to the newly developing nations is in our national self-interest. However, we do ourselves a grave injustice and distort our true image before the world if we give our foreign aid program a wholly selfish cast. For this program rests squarely in the great tradition of idealism that has motivated the American people since our earliest beginnings.

The Marshall plan, the point 4 program, and the present mutual security program, have no parallel in all history. The willing acceptance by the American people of the challenge to help free other peoples from the bitter slavery of poverty is one of the greatest moral achievements of this century. We should not permit it to be derided by the cynical or deprecated by the uninformed.

I look to groups such as this to help bring about a wider understanding of the imperatives of our foreign policies, both at home and abroad. That understanding is crucially needed. For our foreign aid programs grew naturally out of our social, cultural, and religious heritage. We have accepted a great challenge from which we cannot draw back. If we answer it successfully, we shall be assured a place in history as one of the great humanitarian peoples of all time. In the words of Arnold Toynbee:

"Our age will be well remembered, not for its horrifying crimes or its astonishing inventions, but because it is the first generation since the dawn of history in which mankind dared to believe it practical to make the benefits of civilization available to the whole human race."

We are the natural leaders of that generation. Our duty and our path are clear.

THE DUTY OF RICH NATIONS

(By Walter Lippmann)

The President of Argentina, Mr. Frondizi, has come to Washington and gone. Unlike Mr. Mikoyan's visit, his was a state visit in which the whole ritual for such occasions was observed. But Mr. Frondizi has left behind him for the American people to ponder what can fairly be called the most poignant, and it might be the most embarrassing, question in our foreign relations.

The question is whether we are ready to recognize the principle that rich nations in the world community, like rich individuals in their own communities, have a duty to help the poor to raise themselves out of poverty. "We cannot ignore," said President Frondizi to Congress, "the harsh fact that millions of beings in Latin America suffer from misery and backwardness * * *. When there is misery and backwardness in a country not only freedom and democracy are doomed but even national sovereignty is in jeopardy."

This principle—that the rich have a duty to the poor—is not now part of our official philosophy of foreign aid. The United States has made substantial contributions, and not all of them have been wisely and effectively spent. But in relation to our wealth the contributions have not been very great. What matters most, however, is that Congress has voted these contributions on what is humanly speaking a self-defeating principle. They have not been voted on the principle that the rich have a duty to the poor but on the theory that we are subsidizing our allies in the cold war. Because Latin America has not been in the frontline of the cold war, we have done comparatively little about the misery and backwardness of Latin America.

This theory—that foreign aid is an instrument of the cold war, and would not otherwise be necessary or desirable—was challenged by President Frondizi. On this point, there were as he spoke men in high places who were prepared to understand him. Notable among them was Mr. Douglas Dillon, who is the Under Secretary of State in charge of economic affairs. On January 16 before the Foundation for Religious Action, Mr. Dillon made a speech which had little attention at the time but is of great and far-reaching consequence.

After saying that there was no need before that audience to spell out the full dimensions of the Soviet challenge, Mr. Dillon went on "to examine with you the demands being made upon our resources and upon our consciences to help raise the living standards of the peoples of Asia, Africa, Latin America. These are the areas where most of mankind lives and where the struggle between freedom and totalitarianism may ultimately be decided. The need to help these peoples forward on the road to economic progress would confront us even if communism and the Sino-Soviet bloc simply didn't exist."

Why? For the same fundamental reason, which is at once a matter of morals and or prudence, that we have learned to accept the view that within a nation great extremes of poverty and riches are intolerable to our consciences and subversive of the social order. We now live in a world community, and the most portentous fact about the age in which we live is that the gap between the rich peoples of Western Europe, North America, and Australasia on the one hand, of Asia, Africa, and Latin America on the other, is enormous. Worse still, the gap is widening. Rich peoples are getting richer faster than the poor peoples are overcoming their poverty.

The rich countries, with a total population of about 400 million, have an average income per capita of about a thousand dollars a year. In the United States, it is more than 2,000 a year. The underdeveloped countries, leaving out Communist China, have a population of over a billion and an average income of only $60 a year. During the past 50 years, the per capita income in the West has doubled, and it is rising appreciably each year. In the poorer countries, the per capita income has increased very little, and in many places it has deteriorated.

These are, I believe, the overriding facts of the times we live in and of the world in which we have to play so big a part. It is not too much to say that on our response to these facts will depend—if we do not all go up in the smoke of a world war—our prospects in the cold war, and our position in the decades to come as a world power. This does not mean, and no one should be so silly as to suppose that it does, that we who are only about 7 percent of the world's population, can eliminate the immemorial misery of half of the human race. What we can do is to raise considerably the amount we invest or lend to the key countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Thus we can well afford to set aside something in the order of $5 billion annually for development and reconstruction. For that would not be much more than 1 percent of our gross national product.

The way we make our contribution is at least as important as the amount of the contribution. For insofar as we treat the contributions as a subsidy to buy allies in the cold war, they do as much, probably more, harm than they do good. For then we present ourselves in the guise of a great imperial power seeking to buy dependents, and that is a principal reason why with all the fuss about our foreign aid programs, we have been losing, not gaining, friends in the world.

The whole operation of foreign aid would wear a different face if it were founded on the principle—laid down by Mr. Dillon—that we make a contribution because it is the simple duty of the rich to help the poor. It would be a noble act, which would pay big dividends in self-respect at home and goodwill abroad, if the Government would declare the principle that to fight against poverty is a duty, not an instrument of our military strategy.

I do not myself think it is wishful thinking to believe that Congress and the people, who are now bored with foreign aid as it is presented and administered, would respond much more readily if it were inspired by a big idea, rather than by small and calculating notions of how to score points in a contest.

THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, tomorrow, Friday, January 30, in Washington, the Institute of International Education, America's and the world's oldest and largest private multinational organization concerned with the interchange of scholars, technicians, and leaders, will celebrate the completion of 40 years of work in building better understanding among the peoples of the world. This, it seems to me, is an anniversary worthy of note by the Senate.

In the United States, unlike other countries where government has usually controlled exchange of persons with foreign countries, private organizations pioneered in developing cultural relations with other nations. IIE and a host of other private groups—foundations, service clubs, corporations, religious groups, women's clubs, and colleges and universities—long ago accepted responsibility for deepening understanding of the United States in other countries, and of other nations in the United States.

The institute—or IIE, as it is commonly known throughout the world—was the idea of three great Americans: Nicholas Murray Butler, Stephen Duggan, and Elihu Root. They believed that as men and women of all nations came to understand each other through living together, studying together, working together, playing together, we would lay a stronger foundation for peace. IIE has for 40 years devoted all its efforts to making this dream a reality. The institute's board of trustees—which has always been a distinguished roster of American educational, business, and civic leaders—and the three men who have directed IIE's course since 1919—the late Stephen and Lawrence Duggan and the present president, Kenneth Holland, have built a firm base for the participation of private citizens in a constructive approach to foreign affairs.

The legislative and executive branches of the U.S. Government recognized the significance of official support of this field within the memory of most Members of this body. It was only 20 years ago when Secretary of State Cordell Hull set up the first Cultural Relations Division to work out an integrated program for developing U.S. cultural ties with other countries. It has been only a little more than 10 years since the Congress began to appropriate a relatively small sum of money to strengthen this arm of our foreign relations.

The Department of State and the Department of the Army naturally turned to the Institute of International Education for help in administering the U.S. Government's exchange program for students. Since the wise policy decision of the Congress was to utilize private agencies to the maximum in such programs, IIE was a logical choice. IIE had then been working in this field for 20 years and had established close cooperative relationships with colleges and universities and other key groups, both in the United States and in other countries. I believe that both Government and private agencies and institutions have for the past 20 years benefited from this decision. We have, in fact, in typical U.S. fashion, established a unique pattern of public-private cooperation to achieve an important social goal.

As Senators know, of the approximately 47,000 foreign students estimated by IIE to be enrolled this year in U.S. colleges and universities, only about 4 percent receive any financial support from the U.S. Government. The small investment of public funds is, however, vital in stimulating and supplementing private contributions and the expenditures of foreign governments. The institute and other private agencies, and colleges and universities have raised the funds to carry a major part of the cost of this substantial exchange program.

The history of the institute typifies the skyrocketing interest in international exchange of persons in this country and abroad. In 1919 and 1920 the institute brought to the United States 4 distinguished European scholars; this year nearly 5,000 U.S. and foreign citizens from 80 countries will be directly related to IIE's 2-way exchange. In 1919 IIE had 3 employees in New York City; in 1958–59 the participation of U.S. citizens in all parts of the country required the expansion of the staff to 275 men and women in New York, Chicago, Denver, Houston, and San Francisco. In 1919, IIE was financially supported by 1 foundation; this year the list of contributors includes more than 40 foundations, as well as colleges and universities, individuals, and a growing number of corporations and labor unions. These contributions are supplemented by the reimbursements which the institute receives for the programs which it administers for the United States and other governments and private organizations.

Equally significant is the fact that the institute's 40th birthday dinner tomorrow might well be a part of the third national conference on exchange of persons, in which 139 national agencies and organizations, public and private, are cooperating. This conference dramatically demonstrates the number and range of individuals, institutions, and organizations concerned with IIE's activities. The national private and public organizations now actively involved in supporting international exchange programs includes, of course, educational organizations, but more interesting is the broad participation of professional associations, business groups, labor, religious societies, men's and women's service clubs. IIE does not, of course, deserve sole credit for this nationwide expression of concern for developing better understanding among nations. Every citizen is eagerly seeking a means by which he or she can contribute to the hope of a peaceful world. Support of well planned and carefully administered exchange of persons programs is the best way in which men and women at the grassroots of American life can feel that they are actively helping.

Some of the contributions of the Institute of International Education in the past 40 years are listed in the calendar following. In the years ahead the challenge to IIE and to other private and public agencies will be equally great. We must—all of us—here and abroad, find ways to live peacefully together, or we shall certainly perish together.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point a list of some of the highlights on the history of the institute.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME HIGHLIGHTS OF IIE'S HISTORY

February 1, 1919: IIE founded by Prof. Stephen Duggan, Nicholas Murray Butler, and Elihu Root to strengthen international understanding through exchange of students, scholars, and information.

Issued first publication telling American students of study opportunities abroad (France). Began development of IIE as information center on international education and exchange. (Now answers 2,000 information requests per week.)

Formally organized International Relations Clubs on American campuses (they had existed before on informal basis). IIE appointed faculty advisers and supplied the clubs with literature. These clubs are now assisted by the Foreign Policy Association.

Nineteen hundred and twenty: IIE arranged for four distinguished foreign scholars to lecture at U.S. colleges. The institute over the next 25 years brought for their first visits to academic institutions, such men as Jacques Maritain, Carlo Sforza, Andre Siegfried, and Arnold Toynbee.

Nineteen hundred and twenty-one: First student refugee program: Tuition grants and financial aid secured for Russian students in U.S. universities who could not return home after the revolution. (Subsequent refugee programs: Germans in 1933, Chinese in 1942, Hungarians in 1956.)

Nineteen hundred and twenty-two: IIE's first student exchange: Five Americans with five Czechs. (1957–58: 3,044 foreign students from 81 countries: 1,423 Americans in 33 countries; administered multinational exchange of 446 specialists from 56 countries.)

Ninteen hundred and twenty-four: Dr. Duggan, then IIE president, persuaded steamship lines to develop student-third-class passage. In 1947, to facilitate postwar travel, IIE coordinated use of converted troop ships for student use. From this grew the independent Council on Student Travel.

The institute brought together college and university administrators and government leaders to explore problems of Chinese students in the United States. From this and subsequent conferences, grew the now independent National Association of Foreign Student Advisers.

Nineteen hundred and twenty-six: Established the Council on the Junior Year Abroad to assist U.S. colleges and universities to set up foreign study programs for undergraduates.

Nineteen hundred and twenty-eight: IIE founded work student movement—first program to bring foreign students here to train in banks, business, and industrial firms. The institute now handles the exchange between Europe and the United States of engineering students who work in plants in the summer.

Nineteen hundred and twenty-nine: First IIE Latin-American exchanges; IIE opened its Inter-American Department.

Nineteen hundred and twenty to nineteen hundred and twenty-nine: Promoted summer study abroad for American students; organized travel opportunities for summer students.

Nineteen hundred and thirty: First IIE exchange of students in the arts.

Nineteen hundred and forty-one: U.S. Government asked IIE to recommend and place students for first Government exchange program, the Buenos Aires Convention program with Latin America (started 1936). IIE has administered program for Government ever since.

Nineteen hundred and forty-seven: First large-scale IIE exchanges with Asia and Africa.

Nineteen hundred and forty-eight: IIE delegated to help administer UNESCO fellowship program, which provides exchange of specialists for technical assistance.

Nineteen hundred and forty-nine: IIE appointed by U.S. State Department to screen, place, and supervise student exchanges under Fulbright and Smith-Mundt Acts. IIE now administers all Fulbright and Smith-Mundt student exchanges for Government.

IIE undertook for the U.S. Department of the Army to administer the exchange aspects of its reorientation program for the occupied areas of Japan, Germany, Austria, and the Ryukyus.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-one: Established institute regional offices in Chicago, Denver, Houston, San Francisco, and Washington.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-two: The institute moved into its permanent headquarters building, 1 East 67th Street, New York City, the former George Gould home.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-three: Established roster of internationally trained persons which now contains data on more than 275,000 persons who have participated in exchange programs between the United States and other countries.

The committee on educational interchange policy was established by IIE to give policy guidance to agencies and individuals concerned with exchange. The committee has issued 11 major policy statements, the most recent, "Twenty Years of U.S. Programs in Cultural Relations."

Nineteen hundred and fifty-four: The institute initiated a series of musicales to provide a hearing for young American artists who have studied abroad and for young foreign artists.

IIE established a young diplomats program, privately financed, to enable young representatives of foreign governments in Washington and New York to visit all parts of the United States.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-five: IIE began publication of Open Doors, a yearly census of all foreign students, teachers, and physicians in United States and American students and faculty members abroad.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-six: IIE and World University Service set up and carried out Hungarian refugee scholarship program whereby 734 Freedom Fighters were given scholarships to study in U.S. colleges and universities.

IIE became American administrative arm of IAESTE, the International Association for Exchange of Students for Technical Experience—a private organization in 24 nations which provides exchange students with summer training in industrial and engineering firms.

IIE held conference on the arts and exchange of persons at which leading representatives of the arts (for example, Martha Graham, Aaron Copeland, Isabel Bishop) discussed the advantages of and opportunities for exchanges of artists and arts students.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-eight: Opened department for East-West exchanges to develop programs with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

Helped organize the first exhibitions of American designers and painters who studied abroad under the Fulbright program. Designers and painters shows both now touring country.

IIE handled arrangements for Van Cliburn and Joyce Flissler to compete in the Tschaikovsky festival in Moscow.

IIE and Pan American Union in cooperation with Puerto Rican Government sponsored Inter-American Conference on Exchange of Persons to increase exchange with Latin America.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-nine: IIE's Third National Conference on Exchange of Persons in Washington, D.C., January 28–31—the largest and most comprehensive of its kind. One hundred and thirty-nine national public and private organizations have cooperated in arranging the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FARM PROPOSALS

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, I have read President Eisenhower's message on agriculture with great disappointment and considerable disgust. It is obvious that again it has been written entirely by Secretary Benson, who, in my opinion, has been somewhat of a failure as Secretary of Agriculture. Mr. Benson's handling of the price support program and his policy on agriculture as a whole has resulted in the greatest farm surpluses in the history of the United States, at the greatest cost to the taxpayers.

The proposed program, if carried out, would mean the elimination of a great many small and average size farmers. The policy, as laid down in the message today, would only make matters worse. It would mean more and more surpluses, more and more cost to the Federal Government. In fact, the proposals submitted today are the worst of any that he has made during his 6 years as Secretary of Agriculture.

I should like to discuss briefly some of the bad features of his proposals. Of course, there are some good features, too, which I shall make mention of also a little later. I am primarily concerned with the proposals on wheat. We have great surpluses of wheat on hand, and the cost of operating the program has become much too high. Certainly something should be done about it. However, the Secretary's approach surely is not the right one.

He has two approaches. First, he asks for discretionary legislation, allowing the Secretary to set wheat supports at from nothing to 90 percent of parity, with a promise that at some time in the future he would relinquish controls over production. Knowing his position as we do, the price supports under this kind of program would probably be not more than $1.25 a bushel, if they would be that high.

The President in his message states that he would like to move in the direction of the new corn support legislation which Congress passed last year. There is practically no similarity whatever between the two programs. In fact, the proposed wheat program is far worse than the corn program enacted a year ago, and that was bad enough. Under the corn program, most farmers will get higher price supports this year, with no controls over production. They get 90 percent of the average cash price they received for corn for the previous 3-year period, with no production controls, and a minimum support price of 65 percent of parity.

What is the proposal for wheat? Wheat farmers have already taken a 30 percent cut in their quotas some 4 years ago. Under the present program, the minimum support is 75 percent of parity, or approximately $1.82 a bushel. Under the new proposal, a farmer, in order to get 75 percent of the average cash price received for the previous 3 years would have to cut his production approximately 40 percent. That 40 percent cut would reduce the farmer's income by approximately 40 percent. Seventy-five percent under this proposal would bring the farmer approximately $1.45 a bushel for the first year; and then in succeeding years it would gradually be reduced below that level. In times of low production farmers need a better price, not a lower price, for their products sold on the market.

In the message it is stated that there have been many new developments in wheat farming, which have led to greater production. That is true. However, I doubt if the yield per acre of wheat has increased as sharply as has been the case with corn. Certainly the cost of farm operations, which is not mentioned at all by Benson, has increased far more sharply than most people realize. There has been a steady increase in the cost of farm operations year after year for the past 10 or 12 years. About 15 years ago a wheat farmer or a grain farmer farming about a thousand acres had a total investment in farm machinery of only about $7,000 and not more than $10,000. Now the average grain farmer must have an investment in farm machinery of from $45,000 to $50,000.

I stated previously that the cost of everything the farmer must buy, particularly farm machinery, has increased year after year. Combines, for example, which about 10 years ago cost $4,000 or $5,000, now cost $8,000 to $10,000. The cost of all farm repairs has increased in like proportion.

The proposed program is totally unacceptable. It would lower farm income still more and break the small and average grain farmers of this Nation. Certainly no farmer can take a further cut of 40 percent in production and a further cut in the price he receives for his commodities.

There are much better approaches to the wheat surplus problem and to the wheat price support program. Probably one of the best that has come to my attention so far is the one made by the oldest of all farm organizations and one of the most respected, the National Grange. It is also the program of the National Wheatgrowers' Association. It is the domestic parity plan, sometimes called the two-price system. Under this program no export subsidies of any kind would be needed. There would be no storage cost after the first year or two of its operation. There would be no price support cost whatever. It would place wheat on a competitive basis not only domestically but in all foreign markets of the world. It would be a self-financing program. There would be no cost to the Government. It would coincide, I believe, with the price support programs of most of the countries of the world. Few people realize that 96 percent of all the wheat produced in the world today is produced under some kind of price support program.

It is usually either a two-price or a multiple-price system. The domestic price—two price—would be a far better approach, and I hope Congress will approve it this session.

Some of the proposals made by President Eisenhower in his message today are highly commendable. The extension of Public Law 480 and the extension of the Sugar Act are in this category.

Then, too, the message embodies many proposals for controls designed to decrease the production of wheat. One of them is the elimination of the 15-acre provision, which the message states is responsible for 600 million bushels a year of our wheat surplus. The President also proposes that production controls be placed on a bushel basis rather than on an acreage basis. I introduced a bill in 1957 proposing exactly the same thing, but Secretary Benson sent a letter to Congress opposing it. Had he been as enlightened in 1957 as he is today, and accepted bushel controls for wheat rather than acreage controls, there would be a far smaller surplus of wheat.

I approve of many of the other proposals of the President. One of them would place a higher penalty on the overseeding of wheat.

I should like to comment on the cost of the various farm programs and their operation by the Department of Agriculture. One can hardly pick up a newspaper or a magazine today without seeing the statement that the cost of the farm program is $6 billion or $7 billion. The average person in the Nation reading such a statement believes that the $6 billion or $7 billion, whichever figure one may use, goes as a subsidy to agriculture; that the farmers themselves receive the $6 billion or $7 billion in cash subsidy payments. Benson makes no effort to present the true facts to the public.

I have here some figures which I obtained from the Department of Agriculture through the Committee on Appropriations. According to the Department of Agriculture, the budget for the fiscal year 1958 was $4,875 million; for fiscal year 1959, $7,341 million. The President is proposing a budget for the Department of Agriculture next year of $6,450 million. But I should like to cite some of the programs and some of the costs which are charged as expenditures to agriculture, when actually they are of far more benefit to other people than they are to our farmers. Yet they appear in the budget as a subsidy to our farmers.

For example, for fiscal year 1959, when the total estimated cost of the Department of Agriculture is $7,341 million, the cost of the Public Law 480 program is $1,432 million. Much of this money is for programs which have little to do with agriculture.

There are food distribution programs, including commodity purchases under a program for the removal of surplus agricultural commodities; a program for school lunches; and, milk for schoolchildren. Under these programs, the schoolchildren of America are supplied with commodities amounting to $366 million; but that amount is shown as an expenditure by the Department of Agriculture, and unfortunately most people believe that the farmers of America receive this $366 million in the form of subsidy payments. Actually, that amount is spent for food and milk donated to the schoolchildren of America.

There is an item of $590 million, which represents REA loans and Farmers' Home Administration loans. The REA has a repayment record of practically 100 percent. I know of no other loans that the Federal Government makes today which have such an excellent repayment record as those of REA. But the $590 million loaned to REA and Farmers Home Administration in this fiscal year is listed as a subsidy to agriculture. The people believe that the farmers are getting checks for this money, when actually they pay back the money to the Government.

Farmers Home Administration loans are made mostly to farmer-veterans. It is the only way in which these veterans can get any help from their Government. Unlike the city veteran, the farmer veteran cannot borrow money to build his home as is possible under some of the Federal programs. These FHA loans are made to persons who are not eligible for loans from any other banking source. Yet the repayment record is almost 90 percent.

Then there has been a long-range program for the improvement of agricultural resources, including research. There are programs for meat inspection, disease and pest control, education, market development, protection of soil and water resources, and forest and public lands management. For these programs there is an item of $650 million. Yet all of this amount is charged as a subsidy to agriculture. The receipts from the sale of lumber as well as other receipts from the Forestry Department exceed the amount appropriated to take care of our national forests. Yet the sums appropriated are looked upon as a subsidy to agriculture.

The farmers have not too much interest in meat inspection, although they believe it necessary. But who gets the benefit from meat inspection? It is the consumers of America. Yet the costs of this program are charged as a subsidy to agriculture.

Next, there is the Wool Act, which is self-financing.

The same is true of the Sugar Act. The same is true of many other items which I should like to mention, but I shall not do so now. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks a table entitled "United States Department of Agriculture, Budget Expenditures—Based on 1960 Budget."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, the cost to the Commodity Credit Corporation for fiscal year 1959 for all price support operations is $3,118 million. Under this program, $73.8 million is provided for milk to be supplied to various people. This is charged as a subsidy to agriculture.

For the International Wheat Agreement, $64.8 million is provided for fiscal 1959. For Emergency Famine Relief to Friendly Foreign Peoples, the cost during the present fiscal year is estimated at $105.8 million. This is a gift to foreign famine-stricken people. Yet under the budget this amount is charged as a subsidy to our farmers. Still, Secretary Benson, on television programs and in his public appearances, does nothing to tell the people of America who are the beneficiaries under these programs.

There is a program for selling our surplus farm commodities for foreign currencies. From the sale of our surpluses to foreign nations in fiscal year 1959, we received $1,048,600,000 in currencies. These foreign currencies do not go to our farmers. For the most part, the currencies take the place of foreign aid programs. Approximately 80 percent of these currencies are loaned back to the foreign countries for economic development. But, again, this item is charged as a subsidy to agriculture, and the average American thinks that the farmers are getting subsidy checks for the $1,048 million.

There is an item of $129 million for the barter of surplus agricultural commodities for stockpiling strategic and critical materials. These are materials which we stockpile anyway: industrial diamonds, manganese, rubber, and many other commodities. For the $129 million under this program, we get dollar for dollar value in return, and sometimes more. Most of the materials acquired under the barter program are worth more today than when they were acquired. Yet this $129 million is charged as a subsidy to agriculture.

There is the program of military housing for our own military personnel in foreign countries. Oftentimes we sell food to the foreign countries, take their currency in return, and use it to construct military housing. Yet this sum is charged as a subsidy to agriculture.

There are many other items such as these, too numerous to mention in my speech today. However, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table entitled "U.S. Department of Agriculture, Summary of Expenditures, 1960 Budget."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Jan. 27, 1959.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, that concludes my rather brief remarks today.

I shall fight to the last ditch to stop Benson's program from being put into operation. It would certainly ruin not only the wheat farmers of the Nation, but practically every farmer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an article entitled "Farmers Get Only Share of Supports," written by Ovid A. Martin, farm writer for the Associated Press, and published in the Fargo Forum of January 25. The article presents an excellent analysis of the cost of farm programs and how much of the cost actually should be charged to people other than our farmers.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARMERS GET ONLY SHARE OF SUPPORTS

(By Ovid A. Martin)

WASHINGTON.—Uncle Sam has been spending around $5 billion a year on farm price-support programs. This does not mean that this amount of taxpayers' money goes into farmers' pockets.

Many persons and groups other than farmers reap benefits from this outlay.

In his message on the state of the Union, President Eisenhower criticized the cost of farm programs, past and future. He forecast such outlays at $4,490 million in the new fiscal year, beginning next July 1.

Such statements have been interpreted by many as indicating that the amount of taxpayers' money is being paid to farmers.

Actually, farmers may get not more than around $3½ billion of the indicated outlay for price supports.

Of this amount, about $750 million would be in the form of direct payments or grants. To get the remainder, farmers would have to surrender wheat, corn, peanuts, cotton, and other commodities in return for the money.

Stated in different words, for upward of $2¾ billion the Government plans to pay out to farmers, it will get commodities. Money paid farmers for these products comes to them in lieu of returns they could have gotten at the marketplace had they chosen to sell there.

The commodities acquired by the Department have a monetary value. Of course, the Government seldom gets back all it paid for them, but the entire outlay for price supports is not lost. The Government has been getting back about 70 cents on the dollar on these products when disposed of at home and abroad.

Actually, the President's budget estimates that Government losses—which, in effect, constitute the actual cost—on farm products to be acquired during the next fiscal year will be about $1 billion.

This one billion added to direct payments to farmers would bring the net cost of cash benefits going to farmers to about $1¾ billion.

Charged against price support programs in the budget are outlay on surplus products sold abroad for foreign currencies, donations of food to the needy at home and abroad, subsidies paid to exporters for selling farm products abroad, and the cost of surplus farm products bartered for strategic materials obtained abroad.

Eisenhower's budget estimates that $1,033 million will be spent during the coming year on farm surpluses disposed abroad. But this will not be a net outlay. The Government will get foreign currencies in return for these products. These currencies will be used to help defray U.S. Government expenses in the recipient countries. If it were not for funds received for the surpluses, the Government would have to dig up dollars to meet these expenses.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, the revisions in the farm price-support programs, as recommended in the President's agricultural message, are long overdue. The Agricultural Act of 1948 made some needed changes in the programs for cotton, corn, and rice. But nothing was done about wheat, tobacco, and peanuts, the other three crops that are legislatively designated as basic commodities.

Our price-support programs have apparently been built on the premise that the so-called farm problem is a question of the level of price supports for these six basic crops. That is a false premise. It ignores the fact that the six basics bring in only about $1 in every $4 of farm cash income.

About 85 percent of our price-support spending goes for just three crops—wheat, corn, and cotton. The same three crops produce only 20 percent of the total cash farm income. This means that comparatively few farms receive by far the larger part of the vast sums being spent to support farm prices and stabilize farm income.

Is such a program fair to other agricultural producers? Obviously not.

But this is only part of the discrimination in these farm programs. Wheat is produced on about 1½ million U.S. farms. Less than 600,000 of these farms—about 2 out of every 5—have 90 percent of the allotted wheat acres. In other words, nine-tenths of the money spent for price support on wheat is accounted for by two-fifths of the wheat-producing farms.

Cotton is grown on almost 1 million U.S. farms. Here, again, comparatively few of the bigger farms are responsible for the lion's share of the price-support costs. Three-fourths of the cotton price-support dollars go for cotton produced on one-fourth of the cotton farms.

I say this is unfair.

Somehow or other we have forgotten the basic facts of life about agriculture in the United States. We have forgotten that there are two broad divisions in agriculture. About 2 million farms produce over 90 percent of all farm products sold. More than 2½ million farms produce less than 10 percent of the total products sold. The operators of these small farms receive little help, if any, from price-support programs. Many of them produce so little that the level of price support is a negligible factor in their incomes. Because they produce little, they can purchase little. Many of the operators of these farms are underemployed. Such farms are not fully productive entities in the national economy. These are the farms, and these are the people, really in need of sound assistance in raising their standards of living. I repeat, they get little, if any, benefit from price-support programs.

Now let us look at the other side of the picture—the big producers with big allotments. For wheat producers who have allotments of 100 acres or more, the net budgetary expenditure for price support this fiscal year average about $7,000 per farm.

For cotton producers who have allotments of 100 acres or more, expenditures average $10,000 per farm.

For rice producers who have allotments of 100 acres or more, expenditures also average $10,000 per farm.

Where is the principle of fairness in such a program? How does this help the small producer—the man and his family who really need help?

Price-support programs of various kinds are costing us over $5 billion this fiscal year—to subsidize production by comparatively few farm operators—the operators of the larger farms, the more productive farms, the more prosperous farms.

We must stop this senseless drain on the Federal Treasury. Agricultural problems have not been solved by unrealistic price programs. They never will be solved that way. Better farming methods, improved marketing, lower production costs, better choice of enterprise—these are the solutions we must seek. These are the solutions we can help make available to each farmer on his own farm by means of sound and effective programs.

The President's recommendations will help to iron out the inequities in the existing program.

I support these proposals and urge prompt, serious, and favorable action upon them. I hope they will be adopted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I wholeheartedly support the farm recommendations transmitted to the Congress today by President Eisenhower. As the President points out, the price support and production control program now in effect simply has not worked. It has been costly; it has failed to benefit the farmers in greatest difficulty; and it has stimulated production of huge, unwanted surpluses. Obviously, therefore, another approach is needed.

The proposals submitted by the President make sense, in my book. I hope they will be adopted.

Let me put into sharp focus just one of the many problems the President's program is designed to correct. I refer to the burdensome commodity surpluses, most of which are owned or controlled by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Early in 1956, the Corporation's investment in inventory stocks—commodities already taken over and owned outright, plus nonrecourse loans extended on price support commodities—reached a peak of just under $9 billion. That is nine thousand million dollars, which sounds much greater.

Up to recent months, the Department worked that total down somewhat, through aggressive disposal operations and emergency steps to take land out of production. Through these effective—but costly—operations, the investment dropped to around $7 billion.

But the breathing spell was very short. Production of farm commodities in 1958 was far and away the largest of record. As production increased, price support activity had to be stepped up. As a result, the investment total also climbed—amounting to well over $8 billion at the end of November.

By next July 1, the corporation's investment will be in the neighborhood of $9 billion, or about equal to the previous 1956 peak.

If we go to July 1, 1960, the Department estimates that the investment will be just a little under $10½ billion. It is a staggering figure in anybody's book.

As the President points out, most of the investment is concentrated in just a few commodities. At the end of November, the Corporation had over $6 billion tied up in four grains—wheat, corn, grain sorghums, and barley. Upland cotton accounted for $873 million. The total for tobacco was $616 million.

Mr. President, $616 million worth of tobacco in the Government's hands would make an awful lot of smoke.

The investment in only six commodities, therefore, was $7½ billion—or 91 percent of the total.

As the President points out—and I think the figures support his position—the existing price-support programs channel most of the dollars to those who store the surpluses and to producers of a few crops. Farmers producing cattle, hogs, poultry, fruits, vegetables, and many other essential commodities, have experienced growing markets rather than a buildup of stocks in warehouses.

Big surpluses are bad for agriculture in many ways.

First of all, a heavy supply of a commodity, either in Government or private hands, puts strong pressure on market prices. Second, large stocks mean heavy storage costs, which are now running well in excess of a million dollars a day. Also, large stocks introduce the problem of loss, through deterioration or spoilage, which is a special danger in the case of perishable commodities.

The President's program will eliminate many of the factors which led to the surplus buildup. More realistic price supports, for example, would reduce the incentives for excess production. With these incentives removed, there could be a shift in the direction of less control over production. Also, we could look to the growth of commercial markets and to reduced farm program costs.

Again let me say that I heartily support the President's recommendations. It is my earnest hope that these recommendations will be incorporated in legislation at this session of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief rejoinder to the commentary which has been offered today as to the agricultural message of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, the agricultural message sent to the Congress today by the President once again emphasizes the vacuum of any effective, constructive leadership from this administration toward solving any of the problems confronting our country in relation to agriculture. It is a disappointment in substance and philosophy. It is a tragic failure of executive responsibility to admit such a sterility of ideas.

The present farm program, as rewritten and administered by this administration, is a collossal and costly failure. The farm message admits it—yet shirks the responsibility, and offers no alternative.

Costs to taxpayers are increasing, and surpluses are increasing. The economic situation of the farm economy is not improving in relationship to the rest of our economy.

The results to date have been exactly the opposite of what the administration has assured the Nation it would achieve as Congress followed its guidance in past farm messages.

I note for the record, Mr. President, that the efforts of the Congress to write farm legislation have been rebuked by vetoes, and we have been compelled to follow the outlines of farm policy as laid down by the administration. The administration has its farm program, which is the program it requested, and the program which has been a failure.

In view of that record, it is difficult to believe the administration expects Congress to be satisfied with blindly proceeding right along the same tragic course.

The recommendations from the White House for agriculture would mean still lower prices for farmers.

They would not mean any effective reduction in the excessive costs present bungling has imposed upon taxpayers.

They provide no answer to greater use of our abundance other than just piling it up in costly Government storage.

It is distressing that even the Department of Agriculture, with all the array of experts and technicians at its command—and it has many capable people—cannot decide what it really recommends for wheat, other than to offer two completely opposite extremes, neither of which effectively meets the problem nor protects the long-run interests of our country.

It is also distressing to note that it is impossible to find out what the administration is really for in relation to extension of Public Law 480, the Agricultural Trade and Development Act.

For several years, despite insistence of many of us that this program should and must be established as a longer-range program, the administration has persisted in recommending only a 1-year extension each year. The result has been costly confusion and poorer planning. Now, after always insisting on just a 1-year extension, the administration suddenly says it is for extending the program. It does not say 1 year, it does not say 2, it does not say 3—it just says to extend it.

If the administration is changing its policy, and agrees we have been right in saying a longer extension is necessary, it should have the courage to say so and make specific proposals.

If the administration is against a longer extension, it should also have the courage to say so—even though its own technicians and administrators know a longer extension is needed.

Sooner or later the administration is going to have to make up its mind what it is really for, and tell us. Its experts have had plenty of time to study this and other programs. Objective studies have been made by outside experts, at the administration's request, resulting in recommendations for a longer range Public Law 480 program.

Is the administration accepting, or rejecting, these recommendations?

Congress will never know, from the present agricultural message. I think we have a right to find out—and must do so.

Mr. President, the administration has far more and better facilities for developing a new farm program than are available to Members of Congress, with our limited staffs. Yet, if the administration insists on shirking its responsibility, we must and will assume it.

Anticipating such a failure of agricultural statesmanship, some of us are at work on trying to create an improved program. I am pleased that in this effort we have the most able help of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] as well as other colleagues on the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Our aim is a program designed to produce more results for farmers and at less cost to the taxpayers.

How well we can succeed will remain to be seen, but of one thing Senators can be sure, we will soon provide more realistic answers and alternatives than are now offered by the present administration.

Mr. President, recent pronouncements on the agricultural situation by administration officials continue to lead to erroneous conclusions on the part of the consuming public. Certainly it is not to the discredit of consumers that they are used as pawns in a game played against the family farmers of our Nation. When official statements reiterate on the one hand that farmers are prospering, and on the other that farm programs are costing the taxpayers billions, it is natural that many consumers never look farther than the farmer for a whipping boy to berate as responsible for the high cost of living.

The truth of the matter is often revealed in publications that do not customarily reach the city public. And it is quite apparent to farmers themselves, and to the businessmen who depend upon agriculture for their living. My daily mail testifies amply to this.

Recently I received a most straightforward and thoughtful letter from Charles Ommodt, manager of the Cass-Clay Creamery in Fargo, N. Dak. Mr. Ommodt enclosed a pamphlet which reprints an article from the December 1958 issue of Capper's Farmer. I wish that every member of the consuming public could read this article.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the fine letter from Mr. Ommodt and the article from Capper's Farmer be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CASS-CLAY CREAMERY, INC.,
Fargo, N. Dak., January 7, 1959.

Hon. HUBERT HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Now that Congress has again convened, I know that you are confronted with many great problems both foreign and domestic and, of course, we in the agricultural section are again thinking about the problems facing agriculture.

The Secretary of Agriculture for the past few years has used his high office for propagandizing the consuming public as you so well know. To get legislation for farmers, this must be combated and I know of no one better able to do this than yourself. Farmers have not been subsidized by the consumers' tax dollar. In reality, the producer has been subsidizing the consumer. I am enclosing herewith a pamphlet put out by Capper's Farmer which certainly speaks for the farmer more eloquently than anything I have ever read.

So far as dairying is concerned, the Secretary's approach to the farm problem may be one of the most dangerous steps to the future freedom of our country. The records show that for the year of 1957, Russia produced 121 billion pounds of milk compared with our production for that year of 126 billion, and if more recent figures were available, they may even have surpassed our production by this time. The Russians know that food speaks louder than war machines to hungry nations. They also know that by playing the food supply right, they may win over more of our friendly nations in the future.

Our board of directors and myself, as manager, feel that there was no justification for lowering parity by the veto of the bill passed by Congress to hold the line a year ago. It reduced the income of the farmers patronizing Cass-Clay Creamery $250,000 for the year at a time when their expenses increased. Our farmers are concerned because they can no longer hang onto the Secretary's slippery scale. Many of them are discontinuing and will be among those added to the overcrowded labor markets which can only mean more unemployment.

We shall greatly appreciate your efforts again in behalf of a more realistic price support program and want to pledge you our support and assistance in every way we can be of help to you.

Kindest personal regards.

Yours very truly,

CHAS. OMMODT,
Manager.

[From Capper's Farmer, December 1958]

WHAT CITY PEOPLE SHOULD KNOW ABOUT FARMERS

What's the world coming to? The government is paying farmers billions so they won't grow stuff, and we get stuck with high food prices. Wish they'd pay me for not working.

You don't need oversized ears to hear remarks like this in almost any grocery store. It's easy for city consumers to get worked up over grocery bills and the expense of farm programs. No matter how you slice it, food bills are high in dollars and cents, and we've been spending lots of tax dollars to control crop surpluses—and we still have surpluses.

It's easy, too, to single out the farmer as the scoundrel. He's far removed from the supermarket scene and has no well integrated organization behind him to tell his story. There's no real spokesman for farmers; no one to filter the facts from a fog of headlines and oratory.

Is the farmer a highwayman, riding high, with one hand in your pocket and the other in Uncle Sam's? Is he so rich that we should stop using tax dollars in his behalf?

What is the real story? Let's look at the facts.

We're just as dependent on the land for food and clothing as when we shot the buffalo and deer. But in 1820 one man could provide food for himself and three other people. Today one farmer feeds himself and 20 others. Soon it will be himself and 25 others.

Here is the core of the farm problem: In any normal peacetime year farmers can produce more than the market will take at prices fair to everyone concerned.

The reason is that we have, through research, education, and the application of mechanical power to agriculture, created a whole new way of producing farm products. The revolution is still going on. In the past 18 years farmers have boosted their efficiency as much as in the preceding 120 years.

Farmers have much more help from city workers than they did 100 years ago—tractors, chemicals, fertilizers, fuels, an abundance of many other services. Farmers are free to specialize in producing food. And, since the early 1940's, the combined per-acre yield of 18 leading field crops has increased dramatically—40 percent. But producing food is only part of it.

The food business is a chain with farmers at one end. In between farms and shelves of supermarkets is the marketing system.

The off-farm operations are handled by some 6 million persons who are producing for and servicing farmers and around 10 million who are distributing farm products. Adding these to around 8 million farm operators and farmhands makes about 24 million persons.

We call this combination of functions by a new term—agribusiness. It's the Nation's largest business, accounting for 37 percent of the U.S. working force. In their part of it, farmers are a $14-billion-a-year customer of industry and labor—not counting the billions farm people spend for consumer goods.

Are farmers to blame for high food prices? You be the judge. Last year, some 60 cents out of every dollar we Americans spent for food went to the people who bought, handled, sold, processed, transported, and packaged farm products.

A little less than 40 cents went to farmers.

Or let's put it another way: If a farmer in Kansas gave away his wheat, we'd still pay 17½ cents for that 20-cent loaf of bread. If a cotton producer in Texas worked only for his health, we'd still shell out $2.75 for that $3 shirt.

Percentagewise and dollarwise, food marketing costs are at the highest level since 1940. In 1957, we spent $55 billion for farm food products, against only $15 billion in 1940. Of this increase, $27 billion went for marketing.

But before we start pointing the finger in a new direction, let's remember a couple of things. A lot happens to food on its journey from farm to supermarket. Consumers are demanding more all the time. We want convenience foods, for example, with built-in maid service * * * heat-and-serve rolls, smaller units, better packaging, prebaking, precutting, and preselection. We didn't have these services in 1940—and they aren't free.

Take a look at the chart on the right. It shows how the cost of all farm products bought by the average family has changed in recent years. [Chart not included in the RECORD.]

In 1946, the typical market basket of food cost $767. Of that the farmer got $397. By 1957 that same basket cost $1,010, but the farmer was getting only $400.

To bring that closer to home, that means that from 1946 to 1957 the farmer's share went up $3; the marketing share, $240.

Here's how the increase in spread was largely accounted for: labor, $296, up $130; transportation, $73, up $33; other business costs $178, up $69; and Federal income taxes added $4.

Before you come to a verdict, let's look at still more facts: From 1952 through 1957, with ever-increasing inflation, farm prices actually decreased 20 percent. Here are the figures: Total farm income in 1952 is estimated at $15.1 billion. By 1956 it had dropped to $12.1 billion. Last year it skidded to a low of $10.8 billion.

This is the reason why food prices remained fairly stable in this 1952–57 period. Think what would have happened had farm prices gone up at the same rate as other cost-of-living items. We would have paid some 25 percent more for food and clothing.

Net result would have been a really whopping burden for consumers—some $70 billion, at least, say economists.

So * * * it's only fair to point out that in the 1952–57 period farmers actually subsidized consumers.

While nearly all other phases of our national economy have been moving upward in recent years, agriculture simply hasn't kept pace.

Although they make up 12 percent of the population and produce 65 percent of the raw materials for industry, farmers in 1957 got only 4 percent of the national income.

And during this time, the cost of practically all the farmer's tools of production has increased. His costs in 1957 were some $3.7 billion higher than in 1952. This is what farmers are talking about when they mention "cost-price squeeze."

The "squeeze" has put a lot of farmers out of business. In 1950, for example, 25,058,000 people lived on farms. That's 16.6 percent of all of us. Now, 8 years later, though population has increased, there are some 5 million fewer farmers—and they represent only 12 percent of the population of the United States.

And remember, too, many of those who remain have to work off the farm to make ends meet. In 1957, for example, one-third of the net farm income came from off-the-farm jobs.

Now what about farm subsidies? Sure the Federal Government helps farmers. But so does it help airlines, schools, the petroleum industry, housing, shipping, and so on. A fast tax write-off plan saves power companies billions of dollars. Just try to name a business that is not receiving some type of Government aid.

In the past 50 years, for every $1,000 this country has spent for subsidies, the American farmer has received only $5. That's why farmers get awfully tired of metropolitan newspapers headlining the cost of farm subsidies.

Because food and fiber have been at bargain prices compared with other cost-of-living items, it's discouraging to farmers to defend half-truths about the $5 billion the Federal Government takes from taxpayers to run the national agricultural budget. Also, to continually hear the charge: "You're taking money out of my pocket to support farm prices."

What makes up the agricultural budget? How much of it goes to farmers? The farm budget is something of a catchall. Many of the items have nothing to do with supporting farm prices, but are primarily a public service. Take meat inspection, for example. It has been a $17 million item conducted by the U.S. Department of Agriculture to assure the public a safe meat supply.

Other public services include a Government school lunch program and a food donation plan. In fiscal 1958 the Government gave 872 million pounds of food from surplus food stocks for school lunch programs and institutions. It gave 1,400,000 pounds to victims of national disasters. And 1,973,000 pounds were donated for distribution to the needy abroad.

We could name more items similar to these. Even the USDA's crop and livestock estimates are used more by processors and merchants than by farmers.

Moreover, look at all the agricultural exports to friendly nations since World War II. A big portion of these would have been purchased at U.S. Government expense even if there had been no surplus disposal problem. Using our food abundance has given our foreign policy leverage. Farmers feel the costs of this should not be charged to agriculture alone.

Sooner or later, of course, the Government must collect from taxpayers every dollar that it spends. If the Government loses money on price supports—and it certainly has—then it must be made up in taxes. No one's satisfied in a situation like this—neither the rural taxpayer nor the city taxpayer.

What should be done to spread out the national income? Even farmers don't agree on just what the Government should do about getting them a fairer share of the national income. Most of them realize the thing that's responsible for depressing their prices—surpluses.

But how do you get rid of surpluses? That's been the big problem. No matter how much wealth we now have we can eat only so much—stomachs are pretty inelastic.

We have an excellent disposal record for moving our surplus stocks out of inventory and into some useful consumption at home or abroad. Our export market is important. It accounted for 12 cents of every dollar the farmer got in 1957. But this is a market that must be cultivated intensely. We can't get rid of all our overproduction in foreign lands without acquiring more problems.

Actually, farmers would need to cut production only about 8 percent to get rid of troublesome surpluses.

Then why don't farmers just produce less? That would be fairly easy to do if the big business that is farming were big agriculture. But it isn't. It is some 4½ million farmers scattered over a Nation which has swelled to 173 million.

Organizationwise, agriculture stands about where industry and labor stood some 50 to 75 years ago. The farmer is an individual in a great sea of competition. He is a price taker, not a price setter.

A farmer works with an uncontrollable business partner—nature. Sun, wind, and rains control his cash register like a fickle bookkeeper.

No single farmer can do much about changing the supply of food, fiber, and tobacco coming to market. And collectively, farmers can't produce just exactly what our Nation demands. Agriculture is a biological process which cannot be greatly accelerated or retarded in any short time.

Too, 90 percent of our production is accomplished by 2.1 million farmers. Some 2.4 million farmers struggle for the remaining 10 percent. Working out satisfactory answers in a farm program for both groups is no easy chore.

What farm programs have been tried so far? Congress has taken two broad approaches. It has built floors under prices to assure the farmer minimum guarantees for his basic crops. These crops are corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, rice, and peanuts. And it has tried to cut down acreages of these crops on the assumption that if less is planted, surpluses will melt away and prices will go up on their own.

The Soil Bank is an example of the second approach. In 1957 some 5,235,000 acres of land were taken out by corn farmers, 12,785,000 by wheat farmers, and 3,015,000 acres by cotton farmers as part of the program. This part of the Soil Bank—called the acreage reserve—has been dropped. But the conservation reserve portion is still in effect. Farmers are asked to put some portion of their land into grass or trees and an annual rental is paid the farmer for each year of the contract—up to 10 years.

Our major farm policy revolves around the six basic crops which make up only 24 percent of the value of all our crops. Congress sets the rules, and the Government through the Secretary of Agriculture and its agencies such as the Commodity Credit Corporation buys or takes over commodities as required to provide price support. Such commodities are stored, sold, disposed of.

But don't price supports cost a lot of money? Not as much as you might think. For the 4 fiscal years ending July 1957 the total cost of all programs—primarily to stabilize farm prices and income, including Commodity Credit Corporation losses—was about $7½ billion.

But only part of this went to farmers. Part of it went to business for storage of products and other costs.

To make this kind of price support less costly to the Government, there have been marketing quotas and acreage allotments. In this way farmers pay for the help they get from the Government; they submit to regulations that divide up the right to produce.

As a result, farmers are much more efficient now than 10 years ago. Progress in know-how makes food cheaper.

If farmers farmed today as they did in 1940, the consumers' food bill would be at least $13 billion a year higher than it currently is. So this question is raised: Which is better, to have a surplus costing the consumer $3 to $4 billion a year in taxes, or to save him $13 billion a year on food?

What does the farmer want? At the moment some farm leaders are pressing hard for lower price supports, greater flexibility, and more freedom in agriculture. A good many farmers think this goal is desirable.

They want to outgrow Federal programs by gradually strengthening the farm economy.

At the same time, farmers realize we live in an era characterized by the minimum wage and generally stabilized industrial prices. Farmers want to protect themselves against the increasing costs of production and distribution. They want to mobilize their strength to bargain on a more equal basis with highly organized industry and labor.

Considering the independent character of the farmer, he has in general cooperated well with Government programs. He has withstood the hard knocks of low prices, a rising cost of living and higher prices for what he must buy, and reduction of acres.

He has tried hard to compensate for reduced acres—and succeeded. It's the basic philosophy of a farmer to produce. Traditionally he feels it's a contradiction of nature to say he cannot use technology to best advantage.

Just how much does a farmer have invested? Farm investment per worker in the Corn Belt is about $50,000. That compares with about $15,000 per worker in industry. Farmers have $3 invested in production for every $1 that is invested in marketing of their products.

When prices are falling, the only way the heavily capitalized commercial farmer can stay in business is to cut his costs and produce more volume. So farmers have by greater capital and more know-how produced more on less acres.

In 1957, there were about 319 million acres of 59 crops harvested in the United States. Our harvest almost equalled the largest in history—and on the smallest acreage. The 1958 harvest may equal the highest ever recorded in this country despite a record low in acres.

As total supplies of grain have been built up during the years, increasing percentages of carryover stocks have been coming under Government control. This is inevitable under the system of price supports we've used, with Government storage frequently substituting for actual marketing.

Have any steps been taken to correct this? The 1958 Congress made several changes in our farm laws. More changes are being proposed. These may move us away from Government domination of the agriculture industry. And they may allow market prices more influence in guiding production and consumption.

Farmers' net income climbed to an annual rate of $13.3 billion in the first half of 1958. The total for all of 1958 may show some improvement over 1957.

This gain was partially due to winter freezes in 1957–58 which cut citrus and vegetable crops in the South. Too, cattle prices climbed a bit because ranchers held back cattle to restock ranges blasted by 4 or 5 drought years.

Despite seasonal price fluctuations that may seem temporarily to favor the farmer, the farm problem remains. It belongs to all of us. It is as near to all of us as our next meal. We gain 8,000 new mouths to feed every day. By 1975 we may well have 230 million people in this country. We'll have fewer farmers to feed us, but we can count on a healthy agriculture to respond to this challenge.

What's in the future? We can't hope to eat our way out of our surpluses, but while we are working our way out of them, let's understand just what our situation really is.

Consumers should continue to benefit from agricultural research and marketing research which is now being emphasized as it never has been before.

Chances are good that the actual proportion of your disposable income spent for food will continue to remain fairly constant—about 25 percent.

You may feel food prices are higher than formerly. But stop and think if you are eating meat 10 times a week instead of 7. Or if you are eating chicken instead of beans, or eggs instead of oatmeal.

Remember, everything is high in terms of dollars compared with prewar prices. But this isn't due to inefficiency in production and marketing of food. It is evidence of inflation or of a depreciation in the value of our money.

Realize that it took the average factory employee 30 minutes to earn enough to buy 1 pound of choice steak in 1947. In 1957 it took him 18 minutes.

Think, too, of all the conveniences that come with food, all of which put direct pressure on the budget. And consider your supermarket may have 7,000 items on the shelves. Nonfood items go into the grocery sack, too.

The important thing is to make wise decisions, now and in the future. Many farmers feel that, before we drop everything in our farm program for something new, we should demonstrate that there is a road back if new plans fail.

The farm population is shrinking; it will be only a little more than 5 percent of our population by 1975. So, if wise decisions are to be made in the field of farm policy, nonfarm people must be well informed.

This, we believe, is the real story. This is what city people should know about farmers.

FOOD FOR THOUGHT

"America's hole card at present is our food reserve. It can be the greatest safeguard for peace in the world today if we use it to aid the have-not people in time of trouble." (Stanley Andrews, former Chief of the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations.)

"We farmers are not faring so well. We are not only losing ground financially—we are losing the understanding and respect of the American people. We feel that loss keenly, but we dont' know what to do." (Claude R. Wickard, former U.S. Secretary of Agriculture.)

"Agriculture in America no longer stands alone. Where agriculture does stand largely alone, there is usually also hunger and famine." (Dr. Paul Miller, director, Michigan Agricultural Extension Service.)

"The American public has never been hungry. We take food for granted. Perhaps a 24-hour shortage of food would do more than anything else to convince the American people that food production is as important to our security as the latest armaments." (Dr. Russell Coleman, executive vice president, National Plant Food Institute, Capper's Farmer, April 1958.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I found on my desk, when I came to it, the President's farm message. At the top was a note marked "Personal from the Secretary of Agriculture to Senator PROXMIRE: Hope you can support this," signed "E. T. Benson."

I feel very much privileged and honored and flattered that Mr. Benson has sent me this personal note. I know he has done it with all sincerity, and I know the message has been written with complete sincerity.

This proposal is 100 percent wrong. The President's recommendation for farm legislation spells sheer economic disaster for American agriculture.

If his recommendation were carried out, it would result in an immediate cut in farm prices of 10 to 25 percent below the low levels of the past 3 years.

In future years, farm prices would continue to be forced down by annual reductions ranging from 3 to 8 percent.

This is not a farm program. It is a thin screen for the Federal Government simply turning its back upon the American farm people who have contributed more than any other group to progress in our national effort to increase efficiency and to raise our standard of living. President Eisenhower himself has pointed out that farmers have increased their output per man-hour three times as fast in the past decade as workers in the rest of our economy. Yet farmers alone of any major group have suffered an actual decline in real income, while others' incomes have increased substantially. Farmers today receive less than half as much income per capita as the rest of our population.

The President's recommendations today are a bitter redemption of the promises he made to farmers in 1952 and again in 1956 that he would lead them to not merely 90 percent of parity—but full parity. There is not the slightest hope that farmers will ever get parity through Eisenhower's program. Instead of keeping his promise, the President now proposes that the very concept of parity be abolished.

Of course the present farm program costs the American taxpayer too much. Of course it must be reduced, but not at the cost of the destruction of the American farmer. The Federal Government can and must solve this economic paradox. Our hard working, efficient farmers must be enabled to earn a fair return without excessive cost to the Federal Government. I think this Congress can bring about such a result.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I believe that the recommendations contained in the President's special message on agriculture can help put us on the right path toward remodeling or revising the operation of our farm programs so that they rest on a sounder basis.

I am going to direct my remarks to just one aspect of these programs for stabilization of agricultural prices and incomes—their costs. These costs have risen impossibly high. This fiscal year we are spending nearly $5½ billion to support farm prices and incomes. This is about $125 a year for every family in the United States. I do not believe our people understand how much these programs are adding to their tax bills year after year.

A very considerable part of this high cost of supporting farm prices goes for storage and interest charges. Government stocks of surplus farm commodities have risen so high that in the next fiscal year it will cost about $1 billion just to pay the cost of storing these surpluses and to pay the interest on money borrowed for the price-support programs. How does this help solve the problem? How does this help farm people?

This is a fantastic situation. We are paying more in storage and interest charges for price support than the 1960 budget of either the Departments of Justice, Interior, Labor, Commerce, State, or the Post Office. We are paying more in storage and interest charges than the combined budgets for 1960 of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State.

The costs of our farm programs go up year by year. In fiscal year 1954 the total expenditures of the U.S. Department of Agriculture for all purposes were less than $3 billion. Expenditures for the current year—fiscal 1959—for all purposes are now estimated at $7.3 billion—nearly 2½ times what they were 5 years ago.

These expenditures of $7.3 billion this fiscal year are equivalent to 56 percent of net farm income. Every time the operator of a farm takes in $1 of net income, the Department of Agriculture is spending 56 cents.

Now, I know that some of these expenditures of the Department are not solely for the benefit of farmers. Research, conservation, the school lunch and special milk programs, and the foreign aid programs bring substantial benefits that are national and international in scope.

But the fact is that $3 out of every $4 spent by the Department of Agriculture this fiscal year is being spent primarily to support farm prices and improve farm incomes.

The cost is too high. The results are too small. The farm programs as presently constituted and administered are not giving our people their money's worth.

We are spending more on the wheat program than on any other. We have the biggest surplus of wheat in history. By July 1960 the carryover of wheat will probably be at least 1½ billion bushels. A carryover of that size is enough to supply our domestic needs for 2½ years.

The tremendous corn surplus and the record supplies of feed grains dominate the outlook for feed for the next few years. It puts pressure on livestock producers to overexpand. The farm programs were supposed to help balance supply and demand. Obviously, they have failed.

I would go further than the President's recommendations. I have said before that I believe the Congress should seriously consider putting a ceiling on expenditures for price support programs.

I am not saying that the junior Senator from New Mexico knows all the answers about what to do about our agricultural problem. I am only trying to suggest that the operation of our agricultural programs ought to be on a sounder basis. I believe the recommendations in the President's message point in that direction and deserve prompt and careful study.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the first place, I want to state my complete concurrence with the distinguished Senator from New Mexico in the remarks which he has just made.

In the second place, I wish to state that here we have an example and a model of consistency which I commend to the country, because the distinguished Senator from New Mexico is simply continuing in the course which he felt was right when he was the highly distinguished Secretary of Agriculture—trying to follow, at long last, and after much harm has been done by following an opposite course and much damage sustained by agriculture—a course of action which he strongly recommended many years ago from his former high official position.

I should like to ask my distinguished friend from New Mexico a question or two, if I may. I noted, with great approval, his statement that the cost of price supports is too high and the results too meager.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it not a fact that instead of results that were helpful, as to many industries the programs have piled up huge surpluses which have hung like a black cloud over prospects of fair prices for current production?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I think the wheat supply is a testimonial to that fact. Wheat farmers themselves are aware that should present price supports remain every wheat farmer would be in distress.

Cattle prices are very good. Lamb prices are off, but cattle prices are very good. Yet there is a possibility that an oversupply of low-cost feed will tempt people to overproduce cattle. I have been happy over the fact that the livestock industry was on a very sound basis. I would not expect it to stay that way if there were an abundance of low-cost feed. I think it poses a threat not apparent at this time, perhaps.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HOLLAND. I want to concur in the statement of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico with respect to producers of livestock. They refused to be regimented when their lot was poor. They stuck to the sound rule of following the law of supply and demand. They have come back to substantial prosperity. They are to be commended, in any words we can command, for their attitude.

Can we not extend that same logic into other fields? Is it not a fact that in addition to the livestock industry, which is not controlled or regimented, and which has relative prosperity, the same can be said of the fruit industries of the Nation in general, the same can be said of the vegetable industries in general, and the same can be said of the dairy industry which is beyond the area of the relatively few States which produce more than they can dispose of in nearby markets?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I think one of the reasons the citrus industry for which the Senator's State is justly famous, is in such good shape is that the industry would not consider being put under the parity concept. At one time, 20 percent of parity was pretty good. If one talked about 90 percent of parity, as other agricultural industries did, it would have destroyed the citrus industry in a very short time. The industry, to its credit, decided it wanted no part of it. The distinguished Senator from Florida took that position in committee and on the floor of the Senate, and I think it was helpful to the whole industry.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. There is one more question I should like to ask, and that is whether or not, in the opinion of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, the attitude of the corn-producing industry—the largest of the field crops, in terms of the annual value, and I believe also the largest in terms of the number of individuals involved as producers—in their recent action in voting overwhelmingly to reject further acreage controls and to accept much smaller support prices does not indicate that the farmers themselves, by their recent action, are beginning to realize the tragic truth that high supports and regimentation have brought them nothing but grief and loss, and that they want to get away from both?

Mr. ANDERSON. I would say the farmer who raises corn was not happy. I would consider that when the farmers voted overwhelmingly as the Senator has described it is proof of their wanting termination of the program.

Mr. HOLLAND. And lower price support?

Mr. ANDERSON. And lower price support.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1959

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, by the process of successively yielding I have dissipated most of my potential audience. But perhaps it is better so, because a captive audience is never the best group to speak to.

Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill entitled the "Civil Rights Act of 1959."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 810) to effectuate and enforce the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS on behalf of himself and other Senators, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this bill is a measure to give effect to the constitutional right of American children under the 14th amendment to equal opportunity in desegregated schooling, and to provide for every American a greater assurance of the equal protection of the laws.

THE 14TH AMENDMENT AND THE PRESENT BILL

We should never forget, although some would have us do so, that the 14th amendment is an organic and integral part of the Constitution of the United States, which all public officials have sworn to uphold—for the doubters, may I mention the fact that Secretary of State Seward, on July 28, 1868, certified without reservation that this amendment was part of the Constitution.

This amendment, of course, grew out of the Civil War and was designed to secure and to make permanent those human rights for which millions of brave men and women had suffered and sacrificed and which had emerged victorious in the crucible of struggle. This amendment did at least three things.

First. It provided that everyone born or naturalized in the United States was a full-fledged citizen both of the United States and of the State in which he lived. There was no differentiation or distinction between these citizens. All had equal rights and were presumed to be of equal value. No categories of first and second classes of citizens were set up. Negroes, with others, were to have equal rights before the law.

Second. The 14th amendment then went on to say that—

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Third. In section 5 of the amendment, it is specifically provided that—

> Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Therefore, there can be no question but that Congress has the specific power to implement the 14th amendment.

The U.S. Supreme Court, in the Brown and other cases, has ruled that segregation on the basis of race in the public schools is ultimately a violation of the guarantee of the equal protection of the laws and hence is unconstitutional. While the methods and timing are made somewhat flexible, localities and States are expected to move toward desegregation "with all deliberate speed."

Finally, it is appropriate to call attention to article VI of the Constitution which specifically states that—

> This Constitution * * * shall be the supreme Law of the Land, and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

A similar obligation is placed upon all Members of Congress and State legislatures and on all executive and judicial officers on both State and Federal levels.

In order to implement the 14th amendment and to meet the grave crisis of our day in a reasonable, moderate, conciliatory, yet firm fashion, we are sponsoring this bill.

It provides for technical, financial, and administrative assistance through the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in school desegregation cases. It also authorizes injunctive relief in suits brought by the Attorney General against denials of equal protection of the laws in school and other situations.

It thus seeks to marshal our resources of technical knowledge, financial assistance, legal representation, and basic goodwill to meet the complex problems of desegregation in a positive, rather than a punitive, manner.

It aims to place the Congress and the executive branches of our Government alongside the Supreme Court in carrying out the promises of the 14th amendment, recognizing that we cannot expect the courts to be the sole protectors of those rights.

In the years which have elapsed since the original Brown decision in 1954 and the amplifying decision in 1955, there has been an unfortunate refusal, both on the part of the Executive and on the part of Congress, to take any steps to stand behind and beside the Supreme Court in the enforcement of the 14th amendment.

The bill seeks to encourage a maximum of cooperation and mutual assistance between Federal and local governments in ending denials of equal protection of the laws.

In short, as I have said on another occasion, it is a bill to put our moral house in order—for the benefit of citizens now denied their rights, and for the benefit of the whole Nation in its difficult position as a leader of the free world.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, would the Senator find it convenient to yield at this point?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am very glad to yield to my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from New York, who has borne a major share in this struggle, not only since he became a Member of this body, but when he was a Member of the other body, and when he was attorney general of the great State of New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

I interrupted only because I noticed, from the prepared text of the Senator's address, that from this point on he plans to discuss the more detailed aspects of the background of the bill.

I should like to make a brief statement, and also address an inquiry to the Senator from Illinois.

It seems to me that the national and international implications of the failure to act effectively with respect to desegregation in the public schools have now been written on every wall. Those of my colleagues who have had some experience in foreign affairs, including the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], know that nothing occupies more space in the newspapers of Africa, south and southeast Asia, Indonesia, and Latin America, where it hurts the most, than our failures in this field.

Also I believe that by now it has been made crystal clear that the mandate of the Supreme Court is not being implemented with all deliberate speed. As a matter of fact, it is not being implemented effectively at all; and it will take a very long time, involving much discord and great inequality among the various sections of the country, to accomplish the desired end if the present situation is allowed to continue.

As the Senator from Illinois has said so eloquently on so many previous occasions, our moral responsibility and our legal responsibility to make the Constitution meaningful cannot be delegated solely to the courts. We have a duty, too.

The question I should like to address to my colleague is this: First, are we, by the action which we are here taking, based on our strong feelings on the matter, to give the Attorney General the right to institute a civil suit for an injunction, trying to press matters faster than the Supreme Court had in mind when it said the action should be reasonable in time and with deliberate speed?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; we certainly are not. As a matter of fact, there is no doubt that the methods which we contemplate and provide for, if they were carried out, would result in progress which, while affirmative and definite, would be appreciably slower than the Supreme Court originally thought should be the case.

It is interesting to note that, not only was the original decision of the Court handed down by a unanimous Bench of all nine Justices, but that since that time three additional Justices have been added to the Bench, and that in recent cases they have affirmed the original decision. Therefore, 12 Justices of the Supreme Court, in practice, have laid down that principle without a single dissent.

Mr. JAVITS. My next question is this. Does my colleague from Illinois agree with me that we are today trying to strengthen the hands of the moderates in the Senate who want to comply with the law and do not want local disorder or local flouting of the law, but, to the contrary, want to proceed in an orderly and decent way by civil process, with mediation and conciliation and communication between the races, rather than by other means?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from New York is completely correct.

I believe that the liberal white people of the South and the liberal-minded Negroes of the South are the real heroes of this struggle. They are the ones who in the face of enormous odds have been working so long and hard on this problem. They hope they will not be isolated or deserted. Instead, they should be encouraged and girded.

At the same time, they want to proceed in such a manner as will minimize the danger of conflict between them and their society. It amounts to that.

Mr. JAVITS. Does not the Senator feel with me, in view of the action of the Supreme Court of Virginia, in striking down the so-called massive resistance legislation, and the action of the United States Supreme Court, and the action of the district courts following the United States Supreme Court, in standing against evasions and avoidances of the plain intention of the Supreme Court's decree, that at long last we now have the stage set for a coordinated, balanced, responsible, and deliberate effort by the United States to try to handle the problem through a workable system, rather than through guerilla war, whether it be Little Rock or Front Royal?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Following Francis Thompson's poem, "Hound of Heaven," I would say that the hope of many after the Court decision was that we might move with deliberate speed but few believe we should move with majestic instancy. The intent of this proposed legislation is not to make the transition overnight, but rather, calmly, deliberately, responsibly, and in good faith, taking account of the varying circumstances and difficulties in different communities.

Mr. JAVITS. It is very important to note that neither we nor any of those associated with us are extremists, or are out in left field, as the colloquial expression has it, or are trying to legislate faster than ought to be done, or are trying to bring strong-arm tactics into the solution of the problem. Rather, it should be stated that we are trying to bring about a coordinated and considered approach by the responsible authorities in both the executive and judicial departments of our Government in dealing with what we, better than anyone else, know to be a very difficult problem, which will take time to solve, although not as long as a century. We feel that we ought to go to work on the problem and that it is the duty of Congress to see to it that legislation is enacted under which the law can be enforced if we expect the Executive to enforce it.

I should now like to say to my colleague—and this is a propitious time to say it, because of his deep concern with this problem—that what is not marked is that we—and I include myself—are just as cognizant as anyone else in the Chamber, whether he be from the South or from any other part of the country, of the sincerity which is involved on the part of Senators from the South, and of the deep social problems which exist in the South, and that they are decades old and cannot be dispelled with magic wands or catechisms. However, we want Congress to help the authority of the United States to go to work.

As I see it, the fundamental issue involved in our bill and the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and the approach of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] with his constitutional amendment, when we boil everything down, is whether Congress will say that something should be done in a coordinated way, through the power of the United States, in conformance with the Supreme Court desegregation decree. We say that such a program is a real civil rights legislation. We say that the other things, whether they concern voting rights, or similar matters, are fine, and that we are enthusiastic about them; however, they do not get down to the fundamental issue before us in this particular frame of reference. Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I agree with my friend from New York. What we are trying to do is to have our country move not merely with deliberate speed, but with perceptible speed. Frequently the degree of progress we have made has been imperceptible.

I should now like to read into the RECORD a very eloquent and moving statement by a distinguished southern leader, Mr. Marion A. Wright, of North Carolina, and formerly of South Carolina, who was pleading last year for an act similar or identical with the one which has just been introduced. He said:

> So the act under consideration is needed not only by Negro children and Negro adults now thwarted in the enjoyment of rights peculiar to them. It is needed by men and women of every creed and color in order that they may walk unafraid, that they may think, they may speak, they may write in that freedom from reprisal which is the birthright of every American citizen.
> Restore respect for law. The beneficiaries of your action are not just Negro children knocking on school doors. The beneficiaries are as undeniably every one of us who wishes to keep alive and undiminished the principles which this Nation has always carried in its heart and which are the touchstones of our national greatness.

EARLIER HISTORY OF MEASURE

This is the same bill, Mr. President, which we prepared and introduced a year ago as S. 3257. Sixteen Senators joined as cosponsors at that time, and 13 Members of the House of Representatives introduced companion measures.

Despite the urging of the chairman of the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], a bipartisan majority of that committee decided that hearings should not be held on the bill in the Senate in 1958. In the House, the eminent chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Representative CELLER, commenced hearings late in June, but they had to be discontinued in the pressure of business at the end of the session before a full record could be made.

In recent weeks, I have appealed to the Attorney General and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to give consideration to the provisions of this bill in formulating the administration's civil rights recommendations. I have received from each Department friendly assurances of such consideration.

We have also been encouraged by the widespread interest expressed in the bill by persons who are long experienced in the problems of education and community relations. One such full-length statement was prepared for submission to the House Judiciary Committe last year by an able southern leader, Mr. Marion A. Wright, of Linville Falls, N.C., to whom I have just referred. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that Mr. Wright's analysis be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

THE URGENT NEEDS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, while Congress did not act on these proposals last year, the tragic history of the continued nullification of the law of the land, of evasions of court decrees, of school closings in Arkansas and Virginia, of community bitterness, of new State legislative obstacles to compliance with the Constitution, of obstructive litigation, and of bombings of schools and religious edifices has unfolded.

The latest report I have seen from the responsible Southern Education Reporting Service of Nashville, Tenn., shows that in the 17 Southern and border States and in the District of Columbia, only about 400,000 Negro children out of almost 3 million in those areas are now in districts where some desegregation has been at least started—and almost three-quarters of this total are in Missouri, Maryland, and the District of Columbia.

Of course, this does not mean that 400,000 Negro children in those States are attending desegregated classes; it merely means that they are located in districts where some desegregation, frequently of a token nature, has occurred.

Almost 10 million children, Negro and white, are in the 2,100 school districts in these States that have made no beginning of desegregation.

Statistics are not available for the North, but we should not overlook the fact that in many areas there, also, segregation is carried out in practice. I want to emphasize that we of the North are in no sense self-righteous about the matter, and we recognize our own inadequacies and failures. Time after time I have heard our friends from the South say that we in the North try to pretend that our conditions are perfect, and that we are singling out the white South as the sole culprit and making the white South the whipping boy. That is not true. If we go back over all the debates on this subject, extending for at least 5 years, it will be found that those of us who have pushed for adequate Federal action in this matter have steadfastly refused to single out the white South for condemnation.

On many occasions, I have pointed out that the white South is, in a sense, the prisoner of history, of geography, and of accident; that the climate and soil of the South happened to be adapted to conditions of slavery; that because of this, slavery developed, and a large slave population was assembled; and that the freeing of the slaves, while it removed one great abuse, created tremendous problems of social adjustment.

I have always said that had the roles been reversed, and had those of us who live in the North, or those of us whose ancestors lived in the North, been placed in the South, our behavior, taken on the whole, would probably have been very similar.

I have also tried to make clear that we have many inadequacies and many failures in our own northern record, which it should be our duty to try to remove.

I hope, therefore, that we may hear the last of the statement that we are singling out the South for attack. I hope we may never again hear in the debate or read in the columns of writers that we are attempting to punish the South.

The problem is a national one; indeed, it is an international problem; and we as Americans, not as sectionalists, have not only the right but the duty to cope with it.

On December 1, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare issued a sobering statement on the losses we are suffering from school closings. They aggregated at that time more than 1 million student-days, and have increased since then. The full text of his statement outlining other effects of these developments deserves careful study, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DETERMINED RESISTANCE IN A FEW STATES

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 10, 1958, a long list of laws, resolutions, ordinances, and State administrative policies which are being used to thwart the Supreme Court's decisions. These have included nullification statutes, pupil placement schemes, provisions to close or withdraw all State funds from any school which is desegregated, support for a private school system if necessary, criminal penalties for spending tax moneys on desegregated schools, loss of retirement benefits for failure by State officials to enforce State laws requiring segregation, power to suspend compulsory attendance laws, and interposition statutes.

On several occasions, I have also pointed out the so-called antibarratry laws which are being passed in an increasing number of States to prevent Negroes from being adequately represented in the courts. As of the present moment, six Southern States have such laws.

With the full array of State power ranged against weak individuals who seek to assert their constitutional rights, the contest is a most uneven one and now, nearly 5 years after the Court's decisions, the progress toward compliance with the Constitution is so slow as to turn hope to despair. The Southern School News, in its January 1959 issue, headlines its State-by-State report as follows: "Segregation-Desegregation No Nearer Solution at Year's End."

In the face of these stark realities, I believe that Congress and the executive branch of the Federal Government can no longer shirk their constitutional responsibilities.

The recent decisions of the highest court in Virginia and of the Federal courts in that State ought to prove again that the road of massive resistance is a blind alley. I believe it is now time for Congress and the executive branch to try massive assistance, massive cooperation, and massive good will which this bill seeks to mobilize to meet the situation.

Here it may be appropriate to call attention to some of the developments of history. In 1954, when the Supreme Court handed down its decision, I think not a single northern Senator took the floor to comment on the decision or to do anything which might irritate or ruffle the feelings of the white South. This was a deliberate decision. We wanted the decision of the Supreme Court to be brought directly to the people of the South, without any statement by northern Senators which might make the southern white citizens feel that this was a sectional issue. So we kept silent all through the years 1954–55.

When the Supreme Court handed down its amplifying decision of 1955, we similarly refrained from commenting.

It was not until the following year, when virtually all the Senators and Representatives of the South signed the so-called Southern Manifesto, or Declaration of Constitutional Principles, justifying all forms of "lawful" resistance to the decisions of the Supreme Court, that we felt we should speak out.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator modify the phrase "virtually all"?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I said "virtually." There was a handful of Senators from the South, including the Senators from Tennessee, who did not sign the manifesto, and there was also a small group of Representatives who did not sign it. I pay tribute to them.

But I think it is certainly true that about 90 percent of the Senators and Representatives from the South—I believe the total number of Members was 96—did sign the manifesto which signaled the onset of massive resistance.

It was then, 2 years after the decision of the Supreme Court, that many of us felt that instead of leaving this matter purely to the operation of courts of justice, and in view of the attitude of the political leaders of the South, we should at least express ourselves. That we have done.

Senators can search the RECORD through and through, but they will never find a bitter word from us, although we on our part have been attacked quite vigorously, and in places with great heat. We have not answered back in like manner, and I pray that we may not do so.

DAMAGE TO U.S. WORLD STANDING

We are also reminded from week to week of the untold damage which is done to the Nation in the eyes of the colored peoples who make up two-thirds of the world's population by our failure to accord our own colored citizens equality of opportunity. Only 12 days ago, an Assistant Secretary of State, speaking at Biloxi, Miss., stated again that our country is hampered in its relations with Africa by its racial troubles at home.

A Fulbright lecturer in education, Dr. Olsen, recently returned from 8 months' service in Africa, reported to the Chicago City Club on December 22:

> "What is happening in Little Rock?" was the question asked at nearly every 1 of the 35 public addresses I gave during my stay. American race incidents were front-page news in both the European and the African newspapers there. It became clear to me as never before that American democratic influence upon the nonwhites of Africa is to a large degree proportional to what they hear of our race problems in this country.

We realize that the Communist enemies of our country—and they are enemies of our country—have used the unfortunate school closings in Virginia and Arkansas, the bombings in other parts of the country, and the incidents of racial discrimination and religious intolerance to sully our record and to discredit our devotion to freedom and equal opportunity in the eyes of other nations. They exaggerate these difficulties but these difficulties are sufficiently real so that Congress cannot safely ignore the grave international effects of our failure to deal constructively with the problems of human relations and constitutional rights here at home.

SEGREGATION ON THE OFFENSIVE

While Congress and the Executive have been inert in the face of the defiance of the Court and the disobedience of the law of the land relating to public-school segregation, the protectors of segregation have not been content with purely defensive measures. There are disturbing evidences of a new wave of incitements of racial hatred, fear, and religious bigotry.

In addition, stemming largely from the Court's recent civil-rights decisions, a whole series of measures to reverse and curb the Supreme Court have been presented in Congress, and were only narrowly defeated in the closing days of our session last August. These efforts seem aimed at discrediting the Court—perhaps I should say that is the effect they would have—clipping its jurisdiction, and threatening its very independence.

We are warned of these countermeasures by the sage southern leader, Mr. Marion A. Wright, to whom I have previously referred, and who in an address last fall before the National Association of Intergroup Relations officials made a statement which I wish to read to the Senate, because I think it is a most wise one. I now read a section of Mr. Wright's speech:

> In their back-to-the-wall stand on integration of the public schools, the seven hard-core States are now pursuing a new and significant strategy. The early effort of the segregationist leaders was to move and stir southern opinion to the point of open opposition to the law. That was a thoroughly ignoble but fairly easy task. More recently, they have embarked upon a much more ambitious enterprise—and I think you who live out of the South should be quite aware of it. They now seek to subvert the public opinion of North, East and West to the segregationist view. Of course, they don't call it that. They refer to it as education in States rights, limitation of judicial power, and other euphonious terms. But what they mean is the preservation of a caste system in the South. Under one name or another, your aid—you nonsoutherners—your aid is now being actively sought. It's an old story—Confederates capturing Yankees.
> The movement to convert you is well financed and well organized. Certain States have their propaganda bureaus financed by public funds as well as by antilabor money and reactionary subsidies. They pour out pamphlets by the hundreds of thousands. They send speakers on foreign missions. They flatter and fawn upon northern papers or writers who abet their plan.
> This effort should not be taken lightly. Already certain northern columnists, magazines and newspapers follow the segregationist line. The effort to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court failed by one vote in the Senate. And, most unkindest cut of all, the Chief Justices of the State supreme courts gave that effort their implied support.

There is something quite persuasive in this new southern approach to the rest of the Nation. In the first place, the rest of the Nation hasn't perfectly solved its own integration problem. Our sense of generosity finds expression in the twin ideas, "Who am I to tell you how to run your affairs?" and, "I can appreciate fully what you are up against in the South." And, lamentably, there are many Americans in all sections of the country who are not democratic at heart. They listen with a sympathetic ear.

This invasion of the North—a kind of second march on Gettysburg—presents one of the anomalies of the times. This is the age of the sputnik. Each day the range of our interests is extended. Each day we become more acutely aware of the interdependence of men upon each other. We become more conscious of involvement of our own destinies with the destinies of men in world's remotest corners. There is daily borne in upon us the essential unity and indivisibility of mankind, with the result that what affects one affects all.

In such a context, how like a voice from the Dark Ages is the white supremacist's whimpering plea that you in the North have no concern with what happens to your Negro brothers of the South; that you have no license to be heard; that your endeavor to influence the southern situation is impertinent meddling in a matter of only local interest and significance.

Certainly you will not fall for that argument. Only one far gone in schizophrenia can embrace at the same time a sense of international civic responsibility and the provincialism of the segregation philosophy.

You who share the world's revulsion at the Russian treatment of Boris Pasternak will hardly remain indifferent to the stern fate of hundreds of lesser Pasternaks in the South who think and write and teach and preach and speak at their peril.

There is, then, this trend, this effort to sell the segregation cause to the nonsoutherner. Beware of its soft seductions.

Miss Helen Fuller, herself southern-born and raised, and an able analyst of current social and political developments, has cited chapter and verse to the same effect in her article, in the New Republic for January 26, 1959, entitled "The Segregationists Go North," in which she concludes, among other things:

At all costs the massive resisters must prevent reinforcements from reaching the judiciary, which stands today as the lone leader in the new Reconstruction. * * * Congress, in effect, has remained neutral. And it is imperative for those who defy the Court to keep it that way. * * *

If the States which shout "Never!" can prevent the 86th Congress from passing legislation supporting the Court, they will be free to attempt the next huge step in their plan for total escape from the toils of the new Reconstruction: persuade the reformers to give up. * * *

The protectors of nullification and those who defend the continuing denials of constitutional rights are obviously on the offensive.

If Congress surrenders the field of action to those who oppose the orderly and reasonable transition to compliance with the law of the land, it will gravely damage the prospects for a solution to this crucial problem.

CONGRESS SHOULD ACT ON SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

To meet the urgent needs which I have outlined and to end the stalemate or possible retreat that is developing, it is therefore imperative that Congress act in the critical school situation.

The charter for this action, as I stated earlier, is found in section 5 of the 14th amendment to the Constitution itself which specifically provides—

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The Court itself, in a unanimous opinion handed down September 29, 1958, in the so-called Little Rock case, William G. Cooper and others against John Aaron, citing the leading case of Marbury against Madison, has again pointed out—that the interpretation of the 14th amendment enunciated by this Court in the Brown case is the supreme law of the land, and article VI of the Constitution makes it of binding effect on the States "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Every State legislator and executive and judicial officer is solemnly committed by oath taken pursuant to article VI, paragraph 3 "to support this Constitution."

I might add, though the Court did not, that Members of Congress take a similar oath.

And the Court went on to declare:

Chief Justice Taney, speaking for a unanimous Court in 1859, said that this requirement reflected the framers' "anxiety to preserve it [the Constitution] in full force, in all its powers, and to guard against resistance to or evasion of its authority, on the part of a State * * *" Ableman v. Booth (21 How. 506, 524).

No State legislator or executive or judicial officer can war against the Constitution without violating his undertaking to support it. Chief Justice Marshall spoke for a unanimous Court in saying that: "If the legislatures of the several States may, at will, annul the judgments of the courts of the United States, and destroy the rights acquired under those judgments, the Constitution itself becomes a solemn mockery. * * *" United States v. Peters (5 Cranch, 115, 136). A Governor who asserts a power to nullify a Federal court order is similarly restrained. If he had such power, said Chief Justice Hughes, in 1932, also for a unanimous Court, "It is manifest that the fiat of a State Governor, and not the Constitution of the United States, would be the supreme law of the land; that the restrictions of the Federal Constitution upon the exercise of State power would be but impotent phrases * * *." Sterling v. Constantin (287 U.S. 378, 397–398.)

It is, of course, quite true that the responsibility for public education is primarily the concern of the States, but it is equally true that such responsibilities, like all other State activity, must be exercised consistently with Federal constitutional requirements as they apply to State action. The Constitution created a government dedicated to equal justice under the law. The 14th amendment embodied and emphasized that ideal. State support of segregated schools through any arrangement, management, funds, or property cannot be squared with the amendment's command that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. The right of a student not to be segregated on racial grounds in schools so maintained is indeed so fundamental and pervasive that it is embraced in the concept of due process of law. Bolling v. Sharpe (347 U.S. 497.) The basic decision in Brown was unanimously reached by this Court only after the case had been briefed and twice argued and the issues had been given the most serious consideration. Since the first Brown opinion three new Justices have come to the Court. They are at one with the Justices still on the Court who participated in that basic decision as to its correctness, and that decision is now unanimously reaffirmed. The principles announced in that decision and the obedience of the States to them, according to the command of the Constitution, are indispensable for the protection of the freedoms guaranteed by our fundamental charter for all of us. Our constitutional ideal of equal justice under law is thus made a living truth.

These legal principles are cited also in the preambles of the bill we are introducing today. The adoption of this measure would thus clearly range the legislative branch alongside the Court in the maintenance of these basic principles of American government. I cannot underscore that sentiment more vigorously.

A CONSTRUCTIVE NEW APPROACH TO DESEGREGATION

It was a serious setback when the 1957 civil rights bill under threat of filibuster in the Senate was stripped of part III. This had been twice approved by the House. It would have given the Attorney General power to file suits for preventive relief against denials of equal educational opportunity. It might have forestalled some of the tragic events which have followed.

This authority, which would be granted in a number of separate bills already introduced in this Congress, is still needed. It is included in the measure we are introducing today. But the present bill has been drafted with many other more constructive provisions in it also.

The bill proposes, first, to declare and accept Federal legal and moral responsibility for implementing the constitutional requirement of desegregation; second, to provide vitally needed Federal technical and financial assistance and Federal leadership to States and local communities whose schools are still segregated; third, to provide Federal legal assistance where private parties are unable to vindicate the constitutional rights of our schoolchildren and others.

A summary of the bill's provisions reveals the positive aids which it would offer for securing compliance with the 14th amendment to the Constitution.

A. FEDERAL LEGAL AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY

TITLE I

In title I there are specific findings to the effect that the Supreme Court decisions on racial segregation in public education "express the moral ideals of the Nation and the world and point the way to a nation enhanced in strength and dignity at home and enhanced in honor and prestige throughout the world;" that the decisions are being resisted in many areas of the Nation where there has been a failure to make a prompt and reasonable start toward compliance; and that legislative and executive action is necessary to safeguard the rights involved.

It is further specifically found that these rights will be more widely accepted and more fully enjoyed when it is generally recognized that the Constitution as interpreted by the Court is the law of the land, that all officials are bound by their oaths to support it, and that the Federal legislative and executive branches will act to protect those rights.

And finally after the other basic findings concerning the Federal responsibility, the Congress "declares its intention that the right to the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Constitution against deprivation by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin and affirmed by the antisegregation decisions of the Supreme Court, shall be protected by all due and reasonable means."

B. CONSTRUCTIVE STEPS FOR EQUAL TREATMENT IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Through authority conferred upon the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, the bill will furnish to the officials and private citizens of good will in all parts of the country the tools with which to accelerate in our public schools the growth of equal treatment for all of our citizens, without regard to race.

TITLE II

This title authorizes the Secretary to assist, through the compilation and distribution of date, the making of surveys, the arrangement of conferences, the appointment of advisory councils, the provision of specialists' services, and the development of community understanding for desegregation programs that are in harmony with the Constitution.

Appropriations up to $2.5 million a year for 5 years are authorized for these purposes.

TITLE III

This title authorizes the Secretary to make grants for school facilities in areas where the chief problem preventing or hindering effective compliance is the lack of adequate buildings or other physical equipment.

It also authorizes grants for employing additional teachers, inservice teacher training, employment of specialists, short-term training courses, and other additional educational measures undertaken to eliminate segregation, while at the same time assuring that existing educational standards will not be lowered.

Funds would also be available to local communities that wish to comply with the Court's decisions, but where, as in Georgia and Virginia, the State threatens to cut off funds or close the schools.

Appropriations of not more than $40 million a year for 5 years are authorized to cover the costs of the grant programs.

TITLE IV

The bill further provides in title IV that when other methods fail, the executive branch of Government, acting through the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, shall assume responsibility for initiating the development of desegregation plans to accomplish the objectives of the Court's decisions. In the development of both the tentative and approved plans, however, there are express provisions for the fullest possible local consultation and participation.

The responsibility to go forward in a situation in which officials are hostile is now almost entirely in the hands of private individuals and organizations. Experience has shown that this problem will not become any less troublesome if we countenance the resulting delay.

C. FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN LEGAL REMEDIES

The bill also provides for Federal assistance in legal remedies under titles V and VI.

In the history of America's advance toward equal justice, court proceedings have been the means of making many of our greatest forward steps. They are still an indispensable part of our protections against racial discrimination.

A growing group of States, however, have passed so-called antibarratry laws which make it much more difficult for civil-rights groups or others to assist persons in bringing or maintaining lawsuits for the vindication of their civil rights. Other forms of pressure—such as organized boycotts, threats, and intimidation—have also been used to deter such legal actions.

Since the persons who are denied their rights to equal protection are more often than not poor persons, unable alone to sustain the heavy costs of litigation, and more subject than others to hostile pressures, these laws and pressures will increasingly padlock out of court the Negroes and also the Spanish-speaking Americans of the Southwest in their efforts to maintain suits to carry out the law of the land.

To meet this situation, the proposed legislation would authorize the Attorney General of the United States to start civil actions for preventive relief against those who deprive persons of their rights to equal protection of the laws, on account of race, color, religion, or national origin.

This authority is much like that provided in part III of the 1957 bill, H.R. 6127, and in the 1956 measure, H.R. 627. As I have said, on two occasions it was overwhelmingly approved by the House. The authority is more explicitly and clearly set forth here, however, in titles V and VI.

TITLE V

Title V confers the power to file compliance actions in school cases in connection with approved desegregation plans, when the Secretary certifies that all efforts to secure compliance by conciliation, assistance, and otherwise have failed.

TITLE VI

Title VI first authorizes preventive action against those State and local officials and others acting under color of State law in cases involving denial of equal protection generally, including school cases, by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin; but it provides that the Attorney General may sue only upon a signed complaint, and when, in his judgment, the person aggrieved is unable to seek effective legal protection for himself—section 601.

Suits are also authorized by the Attorney General against those who attempt to prevent local officials from according persons equal protection of the laws, or who act to hinder the execution of court orders for equal protection—section 602. Action to deprive persons of their rights under the 14th amendment because such persons are opposing denial of the rights of others, is also made a basis for legal action by the Attorney General—section 603. In addition, the Attorney General is explicitly authorized to intervene in cases brought by others for relief against the denial of equal protection of the laws, because of race, color, religion, or national origin—section 604.

Thus, in the field of legal remedies, also, this measure would extend a significant helping hand to the National Government to the safeguarding of constitutional rights.

The sponsors of this measure do not claim that it is perfect though we have worked over it with great care. We hope that it may be carefully studied, strengthened and improve in committee.

But at least it is a frank effort to deal constructively with the most pressing issue in the field of civil rights, the problem of school desegregation.

It is a means of securing the cooperation of the various levels of government, of giving the aid and assistance of the Federal Government in the maintenance of constitutional rights, of assuring those who are denied these rights that Congress and the Executive, as well as the courts, that is to say, all the orderly processes of government, will be active in the protection of their rights.

It is a practical means of avoiding the insults, the acts of violence, the frightened schoolchildren of whatever race or color, the fearful parents, the repressed persons of good will, and the breaches of law and order.

The emphasis is on assistance, persuasion, consultation, careful planning, maintenance of educational standards, full consideration of the time needed for orderly transition, and not on punishment or force.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACTION SHOULD NOT IGNORE SCHOOL SEGREGATION

News reports suggest that there is currently a controversy in administration circles over whether to include any provisions dealing with school desegregation in the President's recommendations to Congress.

I believe I speak for the sponsors of this measure when I say that no so-called civil-rights program is worthy of that name if it does not face up to this most pressing of domestic problems. The people of the country are entitled to know whether the legislative and executive departments of the Federal Government are for the Constitution or for its nullification; whether we are for open public schools with equal opportunity for all, or for closed public schools; whether we are for backing up the Supreme Court in its historic decisions or for allowing the defiance backed by threats of violence to block the Court's decrees. And I believe they look to us for some effective action on this matter.

There are already some, and there will be more, thoughtful proposals before this Congress to deal with various phases of our human relations problems. Each of these, including our own bill, should be judged on its own merits. A number of them may contribute something of value in helping the Nation to assure first-class citizenship to all of its people, regardless of race, color, religion, or national origin.

In this connection I think perhaps I should say a word or two about the proposed constitutional amendment which was submitted the other day by the very able junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] and which was discussed by him in his address before this body. As I study the proposed amendment, it would provide that the provisions of the 14th amendment shall not apply over the country in matters of education, that in effect each State shall have local option in deciding how its schools shall be conducted, and that there shall be no universal national requirement that there be equal protection of the laws in connection with schooling.

It is undoubtedly true that the Constitution of the United States does not require the States to provide education for their children. That is not a constitutional requirement. But what the Constitution does provide is that if education is provided by the States, it should be made available to all under the equal protection of the laws.

Therefore, while I have only the kindness personal feeling for the distinguished Senator from Georgia, I shall be compelled to oppose his amendment.

PROPOSALS OVERLOOKING SEGREGATION PROBLEMS ARE INADEQUATE

The limited character of some of these proposals, however, should be frankly recognized.

SUBPENA POWERS

I note in passing that: First. The proposal to give subpena powers to the Attorney General in voting rights cases under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 adds little more than a minor procedural convenience, which could be largely accomplished in other ways under existing laws and rules of procedure, and which unless carefully safeguarded may be subject to abuse.

EXTEND LIFE OF CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Second. The extension of the life of the Civil Rights Commission gives us nothing new, and while helpful in some respects, it will be of no influence in the school situation. That Commission is primarily devoted to action in the field of voting rights. If it were to spill over slightly into the school controversy, which is unlikely, the Commission's even division, until the recent untimely death of my fellow Illinoisian, Mr. J. Ernest Wilkins, between those who believe in the Court's decisions and those who do not, is a fairly sure guarantee against any positive recommendations coming from that source for effecting the transition to desegregation.

ANTI-BOMBING PROPOSALS

Third. The antibombing legislation is undoubtedly desirable, and I have joined in sponsoring it. But it is, once more, merely punitive in nature and does not get at the root causes of the tension, conflict, and disrespect for law that lead to these outbreaks.

CONCILIATION

Fourth. Conciliation that has no stated purpose to bring compliance with the Constitution and the law of the land or a cessation of the denials of constitutional rights will have a very limited utility, if any, in the school situation. And it is there that we find such pressing challenges to law and order, and to national leadership.

Peaceful relations among citizens mentioned as the purpose of one conciliation suggestion, are obviously desirable in every community. But the Supreme Court has properly pointed out that this is not the only essential objective or indeed the primary one. I quote from the Cooper case, as follows:

> The constitutional rights of respondents are not to be sacrificed or yielded to the violence and disorder which have followed upon the actions of the Governor and legislature. As this Court said some 41 years ago in a unanimous opinion in a case involving another aspect of racial segregation: "It is urged that this proposed segregation will promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts. Desirable as this is, and important as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the Federal Constitution." (Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 81.) Thus law and order are not here to be preserved by depriving the Negro children of their constitutional rights. (Aaron v. Cooper, 358 U. S. 1, 16.)

The questions which vague conciliation proposals leave unanswered are: "Shall the Federal Government enter in only when breaches of the peace are threatened?" And in such cases, "On what general terms shall peaceful relations be restored? With recognition of all citizens' constitutional rights? In compliance with Court orders? With school doors open to all on an equal basis?"

Without some clear indication of the congressional purpose that the restoration of peace be in line with the law of the land in the field of public education, that is, on a desegregated basis, we shall again leave the victims without hope of relief, and leave law-abiding but hard-pressed local officials without hope of assistance.

Ineed, if the conciliation is free to try to maintain peaceful relations which in fact violate the constitutional principles, it may set back the progress of desegregation.

NEUTRALITY IS NOT ENOUGH

I have pointed out that the so-called Talmadge amendment to the Constitution was designed to reverse the 14th amendment to the Constitution, as interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Brown case and later cases.

In the so-called conciliation proposal we have neutrality toward the 14th amendment as the guiding principle. I wish to say in all kindness, with regard to that proposal, that it seems to me to miss the main problems. The main problems are the nullification of the Constitution and the Court decrees, and the attendant school closings.

If one reads the so-called conciliation bill carefully he cannot determine whether it is for or against compliance with the Constitution. With all deference, frankness, and friendliness, let me say that to be neutral on such a central point of national policy is not a compromise. Instead, it is a surrender of the leadership which the people have the right to expect from Congress.

Congress must not be concerned merely with disruptions of the peace. Congress must also be concerned with denials of rights; and it must be concerned with equal justice under the law.

In all kindliness, then, but with all sincerity, we must ask whether Congress can buy its peace of mind so easily? Can it serve the Nation's welfare by any measures that do not even try to bring the influence and leadership of the Federal Government to bear on the side of law and order—on the side of equal educational opportunity—and on the side of assisting those who would comply with the law to do so.

We must be careful not to take the form of civil rights for its substance and once more disappoint those who turn to us with hope.

The bill which we are today introducing is a meaningful bill. It is a constructive bill. The results of our recent efforts to curb the filibuster have undoubtedly dimmed the outlook for the passage of such a measure. But the results of that vote in no way diminished the need for it.

ONLY A MEANINGFUL CIVIL RIGHTS BILL WILL GIVE NEW FILIBUSTER RULE A TRUE TEST

Because of our failure to change the Senate Rules in an effective manner, it is still possible that the threat of filibuster can be brandished to try to persuade some to take, in legislation, much less than the country needs, on pain of getting nothing. This tactic was successfully used to weaken the 1957 civil rights bill. The high requirements for cloture still leave it available now. I fear it will be used again.

Efforts may be made to press for the adoption of neutral measures as a proof that the change in the filibuster rule was an effective one.

I can see the pattern of psychological and parliamentary warfare developing now. Any plan that seeks to deal—however reasonably and constructively—with the school segregation problem will probably be labeled extreme. The positive aids, the persuasive approaches, the cooperative efforts provided in this measure will be minimized or ignored. The injunctive provisions of part III sections will be termed a force bill, with implications that they are some wild-eyed, new scheme, although similar injunctive provisions are such a commonplace feature of law enforcement as to be a part of 39 other Federal laws, including the voting rights law of 1957.

Then some ostrich-like proposal, burying its head in the sand so that it cannot see the school problem, offending—and helping—almost no one, will probably be served up as a reasonable compromise, a step in the right direction, a means of avoiding controversy and of preserving party unity.

I hope the Senate and the country will not be misled by these maneuvers. The test of the filibuster rule will not be whether some noncontroversial, ineffective measure—dressed up and disguised as a civil rights bill, but ignoring the primary problems of desegregation—may be passed. The real test of Senate rule 22 will be whether some meaningful bill like a carefully drafted part III, or the more constructive measure we are introducing today, can get past the obstacle of prolonged debate aimed at preventing a vote—or the threat of such debate.

The leadership has given assurances that civil rights legislation can be passed. I hope the Senate will act affirmatively on these assurances and hammer out a bill with some meaning.

I hope the leadership on both sides of the aisle will assist in securing early hearings and prompt action on this and other like measures and will support this or some other bill that will help to solve our most pressing problem at home.

Let us look at our national situation frankly and wisely, marshal our best resources for the solution of this problem, and give to our own citizens and to the world a renewed assurance that we can redeem our pledges of equality of opportunity and accord the privileges of first class citizenship to all of our people. We who sponsor this bill believe it will be a long step in that important direction.

Some southern writers have referred proudly to the Senate and its rules and procedures as the "South's never-ending revenge for Gettysburg."

We have no desire to refight the Civil War. But we do not believe that the function of the Senate is to serve as an instrument for sectional revenge. We believe instead that the Senate should represent the best interests and the enlightened conscience of our entire country.

Let us go forward in the 20th century together without malice or revenge in our hearts and with the sincere desire to further human brotherhood and thus make good the high promises of the Declaration of Independence, Lincoln's Gettysburg address and the teachings of all true religion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the text of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 3.)

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have already asked to have inserted the statement by Mr. Wright and the statement by Mr. Flemming.

I also ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the following matters:

The text of the letter I addressed to the Attorney General under date of December 2, 1958; excerpts, as marked, from the January 1959, issue of the Southern School News, giving a State by State summary of progress or lack of progress in desegregation; an article entitled "The Segregationists Go North" written by Helen Fuller and published in the New Republic of January 26, 1959; an excerpt from the statement of the Advisory Council to the Democratic National Committee issued on December 7, 1958, on the subject of civil rights; the full text of the address delivered by Mr. Marion A. Wright of Linville Falls, N.C., at Pittsburgh; an editorial entitled "The 90-Year Delay on Civil Rights," published in the Denver Post of August 31, 1958; and an article entitled "Integration Must Move," written by Roy Wilkins and published in the March 1958 issue of Atlantic Monthly.

(See exhibits 4 to 10, inclusive.)

STATEMENT OF MARION A. WRIGHT OF LINVILLE FALLS, N.C., PREPARED FOR THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE IN SUPPORT OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1958

Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps well for me to make clear at once that any views which I express are mine alone, although I hope, of course, that they are shared by many others. I am not here as representing any group or organization. The phrase, picked up from television, is that "the views expressed are not necessarily those of the sponsor." I don't even have a sponsor.

Perhaps, also, I should state that I am a native of South Carolina and, for the past 11 years, have been a citizen of North Carolina. My entire life to the present has been spent in those two States. This means that I have lived under conditions of legally enforced segregation and have had—if not enjoyed—a front-row seat at the drama of events unfolding since the Supreme Court's decisions in the segregation cases.

Those events have not been a source of pride to any of us, including, I am convinced, those who firmly believe in segregation. I am sure that they, as well as we who believe in the moral indefensibility of segregation and in full compliance with the Court's decrees, are seeking some means by which the shouting and tumult may die, the turmoil and upheaval come to an end. The bill which this committee has before it seems to me to offer the best hope of achieving that result.

A phrase often used by lawyers is that certain constitutional provisions are self-executing. This may be true in a legalistic sense but never in a pragmatic sense. Ultimately, such provisions require the exertion of the power of government to make them effective. Specifically, it seems quite evident that that power must be exerted to give effect to the 14th amendment. It became a part of the Constitution in the year 1868. It was significantly and unanimously interpreted as outlawing segregation by race in the public schools—that was 3 or 4 years ago. But such segregation in many areas continues.

There is no living space in this country for the question: Shall the decrees of the Court prevail, which is another way saying: Shall law prevail over anarchy. The question is how shall the power of government be exerted to the end that individuals shall enjoy rights the Court says are theirs.

TITLE I

The bill has the great virtue that, while fully recognizing the division of powers between the three branches of Government, it marshals the legislative and executive authority alongside the judicial in support of the law. There is evident here no cynical spirit that the court has written the law, now let the court enforce it. Rather, the principle is recognized that, in the solemn tasks of restoring respect for law and of preserving human rights, there is room and there is obligation for joint and total effort. There will be an impressive moral effect in this declaration of unity of purpose.

TITLE II

The bill seems to me to be wise in recognizing that, even with all three arms of the Government acting in concert, there will be, at most, sullen and grudging compliance where the public is hostile or uninformed. That kind of compliance would amount to a sort of cold war which might be indefinitely protracted. No one of us wants to live for long under an armed truce, which is only one step short of war. Since hostility and lack of information are intimately associated, the bill seeks to reduce or eliminate the former by the familiar process of education.

It is a familiar process in that Government has long employed the dissemination of facts to gain its legitimate objectives. Just at this time, through the appropriate governmental agencies, the facts as to polio are being broadcast; boys and girls are being urged to continue their educations; the advantages of careers in the Armed Forces are publicized; the facts as to juvenile delinquency are daily presented; the seven cancer signals advertised; and, in a host of other connections, Government puts facts at public disposal. Every bulletin sent out by every Congressman goes in response to Government's recognition of its duty to enlighten its people. Thus were typhoid and smallpox conquered. Lawlessness may present a greater national peril. Individuals might have perished from typhoid and smallpox. Lawlessness is antagonistic to the survival of Government itself.

If it be objected that in some areas there is wide difference of opinion on segregation and that Government ought not to enter educationally upon a controversial field, my answer is that there is probably no field in which sentiment is unanimous; that the Quakers, a highly respected segment of the population, would probably not be in favor of military careers for anyone, and that certain honorable religious groups seriously oppose vaccination. The point seems to be that Government decides, as it must, what is wise public policy and then adopts the educational means to make that policy effective. The court decisions in one sense declared the public policy; in another sense those decisions registered the national conviction about segregation. That conviction is that there is no place for legalized segregation in a democracy.

I am very glad to observe that a distinct feature of this educational process is discussed by local groups. What is contemplated is not a monologue by Government, but dialogue between Government and its citizens. This is education in the Socratic sense. It is now difficult in some areas of the South to have such discussion. The vehemence of the segregation leaders and their rigid control of the instrumentalities of State and local governments inhibit frank expression of opinion. For example, one Southern State refused to issue a charter to a group proposing to organize for the purpose of fostering such discussions—the issuance being a purely ministerial duty—while chartering scores of organizations to preserve segregation. The fact that under this bill such public discussions may be had under the aegis of the Federal Government will give them a degree of dignity and create an atmosphere conducive to frank and honest expression of opinion.

The bill further recognizes the fact that, while expression of opinion, any opinion, is desirable in itself, solid contribution to solution of the integration problem may only be expected from the presentation of informed views. Hence, there is provision for expert technical assistance and advice to communities contemplating their next steps. Such assistance will supplement, if not supersede, the present inadequate volunteer guidance made available to a few communities.

The process precisely parallels the type of valuable service so long furnished by public health forces and county farm and home demonstration agents.

Surely this gentle and persuasive approach may be reasonably expected to reduce materially the number of communities now openly defiant.

TITLE III

I think practically everyone in the South will applaud the constructive and positive rather than punitive approach to the problem of compliance with law which in title III the bill exhibits. Call it a guilt complex or what you will, but most of us resent the threats of punitive action. It may be coldly logical—I express no opinion—to withhold Federal aid from segregated institutions. But the reception which has greeted all such congressional proposals indicates the depth of resentment of punitive methods. More importantly, if they became law they would penalize those most in need of aid.

The bill which you gentlemen are considering recognizes that in some instances there may be costs in dollars and cents in transferring from a segregated to an integrated school system; that such costs, alone or in connection with other factors; may daunt the community; that segregated systems were created in bona fide belief in their legality, and that conditions beyond community control have now brought such systems properly under legal condemnation. Considerations such as these must underlie the bill's wise and generous provisions for national financial aid.

There are other circumstances much more deplorable which prompt grants under other of the bill's provisions. Georgia and Virginia and perhaps other Southern States have adopted legislation cutting off State aid for communities integrating their schools, either voluntarily or under court edict. Where this happens and conditions set forth in the bill are met, the bill proposes to make grants to such communities to offset the loss of State revenues.

I submit that this is in accordance with the plain duty of the Federal Government.

All of those States in constitutions, court decisions, proclamations, laws and other expressions of public policy have declared that education is a function of government.

Now there is always one circumstance which justifies the Federal Government in entering a State—that is, the failure of a State to perform its proper function. There are ample precedents.

So when a State abandons its self-declared function of providing education for its children, it has created a temporary vacuum which the Federal Government in good conscience must fill. Those children enjoy a dual citizenship—of State and Nation. The Nation of which they are citizens and in defense of which they may be drafted into armed service, in its own intelligent self-interest, will not allow them to grow up in ignorance.

So those leaders who declaim against Federal interference in education while accepting with alacrity all other forms of national largesse, if they actually carry out their threats to close the schools, will have created the very conditions which make such interference necessary.

Certainly, the threat presents to the National Government a clear issue of duty. Where a local school board wishes sincerely to abide by law, but is lashed by a recalcitrant State administration, shall the Federal Government wash its hands of the educational purge, leave the struggle to these ill-matched opponents, or shall it give its help to the community, say to it, "for your honorable effort to discharge a plain legal and moral duty you shall not be scourged?" This bill gives the obvious, the compulsory, answer to that question.

It gives the answer in advance of the event. In so much of what has transpired in regard to integration it has been a case of too little and too late, of repairing damage already done. Here is the opportunity truly golden to act preventively and constructively. Even now little time remains. In several areas the issue of closing the schools simmers; just across the Potomac in Arlington it boils. If you gentlemen were members of the Arlington school board and concerned, as you would be, only with the proper discharge of your duty, would you not have your eyes anxiously upon this hearing as being part of a process designed to strengthen your resolve? Absent the help which this bill proposes, you might have to bow your head and bow your will and bow your spirit to arrogant admonitions.

The practical assistance given to school units under title III—the mere declaration that such assistance is available—should still further reduce the area of open opposition.

TITLE IV

Title IV of the bill presents a new and imaginative approach to the problem of achieving compliance with law. Thus far, under this bill, all efforts toward that end have been left to individual initiative and action. For reasons which I shall partially discuss in a moment that method has serious limitations. This bill is based upon the solid premise that where rights have been judicially established—rights common to a substantial number of people—it is a legitimate concern of government to see that these are not mere paper rights found only in the bound volumes of judicial reports, but that they are actual rights, present and enjoyed in the daily lives of the people affected. The manifest and flagrant contrast between what the courts have directed and what one sees at every crossroads constitutes a gross reflection upon government. The Government cannot long remain in this posture of indifference and apparent impotence without losing respect for itself and without sacrificing the respect of mankind at home and abroad. For such respect we must have a decent regard.

Just a word as to why it is unfair and unrealistic to leave to the individual schoolchild the critical and momentous task of securing compliance with law. This is not a contest between individual litigants over some such matter as a boundary line or the sale of a horse. It is a contest between a child and his school district, with the awesome figure of the State on stage or standing in the wings. All of the resources of the State and most of the instrumentalities of public opinion are against the child. Money of taxpayers finances the defense; legal brains employed by the State map the strategy of exclusion, setting up innumerable barriers and hurdles to bar admission.

However, the most sinister aspect of the nullification effort is the spate of antibarratry laws adopted in several of the resistant States. These are admittedly designed to deprive the child of legal aid from the one quarter where it could be expected. It is a great tribute to the NAACP that the States concerned have been so unsuccessful in competition with it before judicial tribunals that they adopt the desperate expedient of declaring it an outlaw.

So there is the completely unequal struggle between child and district.

What is the issue? In its narrowest sense, it is the admission of a child into a school. But the issue is far broader than that. It is the issue of respect for law and the issue of enjoying equal rights under law. Certainly with education government is not unconcerned, but the very life of government itself hinges upon respect for law; and the devotion of its citizens at home and its role of leadership abroad depend upon proof of its claim that all are equal before the law.

In the presence of so unequal a struggle over issues so momentous and crucial to it, can government be above the battle? Can it, in effect, say to the ambitious Negro pupil, seeking to enjoy a right already solemnly decreed to be his, "We are unconcerned, indifferent as to the outcome. You alone must pit your puny strength against the massive and awesome power of your native State"? In only the narrowest sense is the right sought to be enjoyed a private one. In any realistic view, it is a right profoundly affected with a public interest.

Under such circumstances government has a solemn obligation to intervene, to throw its weight and influence and prestige into the struggle.

The bill wisely, in my opinion, seeks to have government move first upon the nonlegal front, to take action designed to obviate litigation, always disruptive of community harmony. It authorizes the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, in consultation with local officials and interested citizens, to devise a plan of integration conforming to the requirement of deliberate speed. There are the safeguards of proper notice and full public hearings. Ultimately, after compliance with all procedural provisions, carefully delineated in the bill, the Secretary promulgates a plan, which, in his opinion, is fair and workable and transmits the plan to the proper public officials.

Again, it seems not unreasonable to hope that a plan of integration so carefully developed, with full community participation, or, at least, the right of full participation, would appeal to reasonable minds with the result that many units of school administration would move toward compliance with law.

TITLE V

In title V the bill, as it must, comes to grips with the possibility of noncompliance. Up to this point under the bill the initiative of the Federal Government merely filled the vacuum created by paralysis of local initiative. It has perforce exercised a function which the local unit has failed to exercise. But conceivably a local unit—municipality, school district, or other—may not act to put into effect the plan so painstakingly devised. What, then, is Government to do?

Up to this point, also, what has been secured is an executive determination that the plan is fair and workable. But in case of rejection within a reasonable time, the bill sets up the machinery for a judicial determination of the same issues. The Attorney General is authorized to act. He may do so by instituting a suit against the appropriate officials, seeking a declaratory judgment, or other decree, that the district or other unit is subject to the terms of the plan.

Here again are safeguarding provisions for notice, hearings, evidence and modification or amendment of the plan if the record justifies or requires.

It will be noticed that in every step taken under this bill local interests are fully consulted. Every conceivable party in interest has his day in court. He may be heard in opposition to, or in full advocacy or modification of, the proposed plan or any of its provisions, or, indeed, in support of his own plan. The requirements of fair play—even of tender regard for community sensibilities—could hardly be further extended.

Out of all of this multitude of counsel, this unhurried and probing consideration of the problems of the community, there finally emerges a decree which fixes the legal rights and responsibilities of the parties. By its terms and in accordance with established practice, all are bound.

Surely, the care, the persuasion, the sympathy, the awareness of complexities, shown by the steps taken up to this point will not go unrewarded. Surely, scores of communities will respond favorably to these overtures of Government.

TITLE VI

But the Congress must face up to the regrettable possibility that, in exceptional instances, even such carefully wrought decrees may be defied; that, in other instances, the compliance may be more pretensive than real; and that, in still others, there may be undue delay or only partial performance.

But the decrees now under consideration are only one facet of equal protection of the laws. Congressional notice may be taken of facts within the knowledge of ordinary mortals. Deprivation or denial of other legal rights to persons of color—denial often made effective because perpetrated by virtue of office—are fairly commonplace in some areas, not exclusively in the South. It would be a morbid exercise and serve no useful purpose to list them here.

These denials constitute a challenge to the authority of government. Only a pusillanimous government would fail to meet the challenge.

The bill, therefore, authorizes the Attorney General, upon receipt of signed complaints, from a person or persons in the judgment of the Attorney General unable for any reason to seek effective legal protection of rights under the 14th amendment, to institute suits for injunctions or other appropriate preventive relief.

The Government must take this step, or it must say to the Negro citizen, "You must go it alone; you must buck your State; you must assume full risk of reprisal." That might be proper in a suit over purchase price of a horse; it is not proper in an issue so freighted and charged with public interest.

The bill presents no radical departure from accepted principles. In the cases of litigants unable to pay for printing appeals to higher courts, many, if not all States, allow perfection of the appeals in formo pauperis. All States assign counsel to indigent defendants in capital cases. Many States have created the office of public defender to assure beyond doubt the proper protection of private rights. And the military services provide free competent counsel for defendants in all court-martial proceedings.

What underlies this provision of counsel for those unable to hire their own lawyers? It is the principle that no man shall be deprived of a legal right merely because for financial reasons he is unable to have his cause properly presented. Surely rights secured under the 14th amendment are at least of equal dignity and sanctity with those invoked by a bootlegger or reckless driver, for whom the services of a public defender are provided. And surely, also, the financial reason for nonemployment of counsel is no more controlling of human action than the massed pressure of public opinion, the arbitrary and tenacious power of a State, the real and present danger of reprisal, repression, and violence. The Negro child of school age and his parents know that, even if they had the needed funds, they would sue at their peril.

Government is not being generous; it is merely being wise in expressions of concern for careful protection of rights. For they are not alone the rights of the man in the dock; they are the rights of all of us. Impair his rights, and you impair the rights of every American citizen. Preserve his rights inviolate, and you preserve inviolate the rights of us all.

It would, of course, be regrettable if the legal power of Government had to be exercised in the manner permitted in the bill. The alternatives are vastly more regrettable. What are they?

First, that Government should be indifferent concerning the enjoyment of equal rights by its citizens.

Second, that two coordinate branches of Government should leave the third, the judiciary, impotent to enforce its decrees.

And, third, that the Congress and the Executive should require a lone wronged individual to risk reprisal, repression, boycott and violence in order to establish his legal rights.

It is easy to embrace these three alternatives. All that is required is inaction, some yielding to the soft seductions of irresolution, some retreat from a stern task. A government thus recreant will not for long have or deserve the devotion of its citizens at home or the respect of citizens of other lands.

Laws, of course, will not solve all human problems. But they are aids to solution. In the form of bills before enactment they afford the opportunity to register the national will, the national conviction. The bill presently under consideration seems to me to speak clearly what lies in the American conscience.

Its enactment into law will constitute a ringing and practical declaration that in this Nation human rights are so priceless a boon that all the power of government will be marshalled to the task of their preservation.

Mr. Chairman, there is one point about this act, or any Civil Rights Act for that matter, which we may be inclined to overlook. It may be defined as the collateral results, or the fringe benefits, of the act. I so designate it because the beneficiaries are not necessarily persons of color or members of a minority group, for whom the aid and protection of the act are primarily designed.

May I make an admission for myself and, I imagine, for many others concerned with this type of legislation. We are perhaps sometimes suffused with a sense of our own goodness. We seldom say so aloud, of course—this is probably the first time you ever heard it except in the form of an accusation—but, so mixed are human motives, that righteous advocacy of a good cause may bring to the advocate an undue and unbecoming sensation of moral superiority. "Here are we," we say to ourselves, "spending our time, energy, resources and talents in order that others may enjoy rights equal to our own." There is an inflating balm about such reflections.

But dare we lay that flattering unction to our souls? The lives of all of us are so closely knit that we all writhe and flinch and suffer when the lash of injustice falls on another's back. There is no pinpointing of a target to one man of color. He is the victim of the searing and blinding flash. The lethal fallout blights all mankind. Nowhere is there immunity or sanctuary.

The original intention of segregationists 2 or 3 years ago could have been simply stated. It was by any means to keep Negro children from enjoying a right the court said was theirs. But into what strange and dishonorable and even bloody paths has that intention led us. White professors have been fired from university faculties. White Protestant ministers have been evicted from their pulpits, Jewish synagogues have been burned. The residences of a white preacher in Durham, N.C., and a white Gentile woman in Gaffney, S.C., have been bombed. Everywhere the story is repeated. What had those people done? They had spoken their convictions in response to the promptings of duty or religion. This is thought control of a type believed to exist only on the other side of the Iron Curtain.

So the act under consideration is needed not only by Negro children and Negro adults now thwarted in the enjoyment of rights peculiar to them. It is needed by men and women of every creed and color in order that they may walk unafraid, that they may think, they may speak, they may write in that freedom from reprisal which is the birthright of every American citizen.

Restore respect for law. The beneficiaries of your action are not just Negro children knocking on school doors. The beneficiaries are as undeniably everyone of us who wishes to keep alive and undiminished the principles which this Nation has always carried in its heart and which are the touchstones of our national greatness.

MILLION STUDENT-DAYS LOST IN CLOSINGS, FLEMMING SAYS—SECRETARY CALLS SHUTDOWN IN INTEGRATION FIGHT INDEFENSIBLE—FEARS GREAT HARM TO PUPILS AND TEACHERS

(By Bess Furman)

WASHINGTON, December 1.—Secretary Arthur S. Flemming reported today that more than a million pupil-days already had been lost by the closings of public schools to avoid integration.

The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare repeatedly referred to this loss and other losses of school time as indefensible.

In a statement at a news conference he tallied these losses by localities—for four schools in Little Rock, Ark., six in Norfolk, Va., two in Charlottesville, Va., and one in Warren County, Va. He also evaluated the total educational loss in terms of the effect on teachers, the effect on young people, and the effect on American ideals.

Secretary Flemming's statement followed the morning session of his all-day conference with the heads of voluntary organizations concerned with elementary and secondary education. Many conferees, particularly representatives of labor groups, asserted that the questions of human rights raised by the closing of the schools would result in dire national and international consequences. A spokesman for the American Friends Service committee asked Mr. Flemming to make an objective study of the closed schools.

The Secretary replied that the statement he had prepared for today constituted at least a beginning of the process of evaluating the impact.

In his statement, Secretary Flemming noted that this week the closed schools "are passing the deadline when it is impossible for them to complete the recognized minimum school year of approximately 180 days by June 30."

Already, he went on, about 16,400 young people have missed from 53 to 64 learning days. Of these students, about 6,500 are now attending improvised emergency classes; 3,000 are traveling to public schools elsewhere; about 1,500 are attending newly established private schools and about 250 to 300 are in regular private schools. Still others are attending night classes or taking correspondence courses.

"All these emergency arrangements," the Secretary said, "still leaves about 3,400 young people apparently deprived of any schooling whatsoever."

Of 720 teachers in the closed schools, he said, about 405 are tutoring in improvised classes and 315 are not teaching but are being paid—this year—under their contracts.

It seems logical to conclude, Mr. Flemming said, that these teachers will not be interested in continuing their careers under the conditions confronting them in these communities.

He listed many losses to the students such as loss of motivation, interruption of study habits, lack of access to libraries, and possible deferment or abandonment of college training for the high school seniors.

He noted that this country throughout its history increasingly had committed itself to free education for all.

"When young people in America are denied the opportunity of attending school, we risk a loss of their faith in one of America's highest ideals," the Secretary asserted.

He concluded by saying he was confident that the citizens of the communities affected would insist on the schools being opened "under policies that will be in harmony with the decisions of the courts."

In a separate statement, Secretary Flemming made it clear that none of the equipment loan funds for private schools under the National Defense Education Act would be likely to go to the private schools set up to avoid obeying the 1954 Supreme Court outlawing segregation in public schools.

Secretary Flemming said that any application coming from such schools would be considered on its merits. But factors to be taken into account, he said, will include "the sources of financial support for the school, the stability and adequacy of the funds [and] the probability of continued operation of the school for the life of the loan."

At the morning conference, labor spokesmen renewed their demands for Federal legislation to aid school construction and raise teachers' pay.

One spokesman for the labor groups also urged "a study of what we are doing in our school system to meet the far greater problem of adjusting to new cultures as they arise in the world picture." Such adjustment, he said, "may perhaps mean our survival."

Secretary Flemming also reported today that 836 out of 1,077 reporting universities had stated that they intended to participate, starting next semester, in the student loan program provided for by the National Defense Education Act. For the first year, $47,500,000 in Federal funds are authorized.

FLEMMING'S STATEMENT ON CLOSED PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Last September an unprecedented thing happened in America.

Teachers were ready to teach, young people were ready to learn, classrooms, books and other facilities were all ready—but in four communities 13 schools did not open.

This was a tragic new circumstance in a Nation which has proudly pioneered in providing free public education for all.

Today the schools are still closed—four schools in Little Rock, six in Norfolk, two in Charlottesville, and one in Warren County, Va. No one can predict when they will reopen.

At a news conference 2 weeks ago, I was asked for an evaluation of the effects of closing these schools. I feel that this is an appropriate time to make such an evaluation in view of the fact that this week the closed schools are passing the deadline when it is impossible for them to complete the recognized minimum school year of approximately 180 days by June 30. Any effort to complete the school year during the summer months would involve, of course, the payment of additional salaries to teachers and members of the school staff and would undoubtedly be very difficult to arrange.

A precise evaluation, of course, is impossible. There are some measurable factors such as days of schooling lost. There are reasonable surmises as to obstacles the young people may face in the future. But no one can foresee all the significant social, economic, and psychological effects—on the children, on teachers, on the community—of closing the doors of public schols to our young people.

THE DAYS LOST

I am indebted to the Southern Education Reporting Service for statistical data on the number of regular school days and the emergency arrangements which have been made for many students. A summary of the situation in each community is attached.

Since the normal date for opening school, about 16,400 young people already have missed 54 to 68 days of learning in their regular public schools—a total of nearly 1 million pupil days.

Of these 16,400 students, approximately 6,500 attending improvised emergency classes in homes or makeshift quarters, many of them without laboratory equipment, libraries, or other needed facilities. About 3,000 are traveling varying distances to public schools in other communities. A little over 1,500 are attending newly established private schools set up especially for this emergency—schools which also often lack laboratories, libraries, and other needed facilities. Approximately 250 to 300 are attending regular private schools. Others are attending special night classes in nearby public schools, or getting part-time education by mail or through other special courses.

It is clear that many parents, teachers, and students have improvised to meet the situation, in an effort to carry forward some type of educational program. There is little question, however, that many young people in these improvised classes are not receiving the same quality of well-rounded education they would have received in regular public schools.

Three thousand four hundred lack schooling

And all these emergency arrangements still leave about 3,400 young people apparently deprived of any schooling whatsoever.

There are about 720 teachers in the closed schools. About 405 apparently are tutoring in improvised classes, while 315 evidently are not teaching. Virtually all are continuing to be paid—this year—under their contracts.

It seems logical to conclude that many of these teachers will not be interested in continuing their professional careers under the conditions that now confront them in these communities. They will have no difficulty in obtaining employment elsewhere in view of the fact that we are confronted with a national shortage of approximately 132,000 teachers.

I was impressed by the following testimony in Federal court by Mrs. Mary Johnson, a Norfolk teacher for 36 years, as quoted in the press:

"They [teachers] have put their whole lives in public schools—they see what they have spent all their lives building up falling apart—I can't really describe to you the feeling of insecurity."

Norfolk School Superintendent J. J. Brewbaker was quoted as testifying that school closings were having a demoralizing effect on teachers, and that the State of Virginia as well as Norfolk would have a hard time obtaining instructors next year.

EFFECTS ON YOUNG PEOPLE

While educational losses to the young people involved cannot be measured precisely, there are many reasons for grave concern. Following are some of these reasons:

Some of the young people who are out of school now may never return. During prolonged absences from school some young people develop other interests and lose their motivation or desire to return to school or go on to college.

Some of those who return to school may not do as well in their subjects. Extended absence frequently causes young people to lose interest in regular, intensive study. Desirable habits are broken. Further, because of the long void since they last attended regular classes, many students will have to spend more time reviewing earlier studies before they will be well prepared to move ahead into new ground.

Students who return to school after taking part-time courses this year, or only one or two classes, will have difficulty finding their place in the normal sequence of the school program. Because of the wide variations in education received by students during the period the regular schools are closed, the schools themselves will have difficulty reestablishing well-coordinated classes and curriculums.

Many opportunities lost

Students who miss long periods of regular education lose much more than formal schooling in the basic academic subjects. They lose the benefit of many other regular activities which are a part of the ordinary schoolday. They miss the exposure to good literature, magazines and reference books in school libraries. They lose opportunities to acquire an appreciation of outstanding music and art. They lose the values of such facilities as science laboratories, machine shops, gymnasiums. Some pupils who are not in school may find some of these opportunities in the home, church, or elsewhere in the community, but such opportunities often are quite limited.

Many of the 2,360 seniors in the closed schools, who had planned to go to college next year and still want to do so, will find serious obstacles in their way. For example, for some, failure to complete a school year of 180 days will create problems when it comes to acceptance of credits for entrance into college. Some students may be able to overcome such handicaps through individual effort, or by taking special tests; but many students who miss all or part of their regular senior classes may have difficulty meeting college entrance requirements.

There are other effects of closing public schools which may be less immediate but which are significant in the long run. For example, sporadic or insufficient schooling can seriously lessen a young person's future earning power and productivity. Also, many young people need the sense of purpose—the moral and social guidance—provided by regular attendance in school. There is little doubt that the lack of regular, constructive activities in school can contribute to delinquency. Further, children who are suddenly unable to attend their regular school may develop a sense of insecurity, a fear that they will not be able to advance in competition with others who are receiving a normal education.

Finally, prolonged and enforced absence from school can affect the development of a young person for future citizenship. Throughout the history of this country, we have increasingly come to understand that our free society can prosper only on the base of an educated and informed citizenry, achieved through free public education for all.

When young people in America are denied the opportunity of attending school, we risk a loss of their faith in one of America's highest ideals.

I am confident that as the losses flowing from the closing of public schools become more and more evident, the citizens of these communities are going to insist on decisions being made that will result in the schools being opened under policies that will be in harmony with decisions of the courts.

DATA BY COMMUNITIES ON STUDENT DAYS MISSED AND EMERGENCY EDUCATIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

Norfolk: 9,950 young people have been out of their regular classes for 69 school days. About 1,620 students are attending regular public schools in other communities; 948 are attending special night classes in South Norfolk; about 4,200 are attending special tutoring classes taught by public school teachers; about 100 are in regular private schools, and 250 are attending newly-improvised private schools. That leaves about 2,525 who apparently are getting no education.

Little Rock: About 3,700 young people have missed 60 days in their regular schools. About 1,300 students are enrolled in full time private schools; 1,268 are enrolled in public schools in other communities; 527 are getting part-time education by mail or in special private classes; about 604 young people apparently are getting no education.

Charlottesville: 735 young people have missed 63 days in their regular classes. About 1,485 students apparently are attending private, emergency classes, taught by public school teachers; 50 to 100 are in regular private schools; a few are attending public schools in other communities. This leaves 90 to 140 who apparently are not attending classes at all.

Warren County: 1,044 students have missed 54 days in their regular classes. About 780 are in emergency private classes; 90 to 100 are in regular private schools or public schools in other communities. Apparently about 160 are not in school at all.

TITLE I

Short title and findings

SEC. 101. This Act may be cited as the "Civil Rights Act of 1959".

SEC. 102. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding racial segregation unlawful in public education, public transportation, and public recreational facilities (hereinafter referred to as the antisegregation decisions) as a denial of the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws express the moral ideals of the Nation and the world and point the way to a nation enhanced in strength and dignity at home and enhanced in honor and prestige throughout the world,

(2) these antisegregation decisions are being resisted in many areas of the Nation most directly affected by them and indirectly evaded in other areas, thereby denying to millions of Americans within our borders the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws,

(3) many States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units have failed to make a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance with the Supreme Court's decisions in the field of public education despite the substantial time which has already elapsed since the promulgation of those decisions in 1954 and 1955,

(4) the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws is being denied to many persons because of race, color, religion, or national origin in fields other than education, transportation, and recreation,

(5) these denials of the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws restrict millions of Americans to second-class citizenship and deprive the Nation of the maximum development and maximum benefits that can be contributed by such persons, and

(6) legislative and executive action (A) is necessary to safeguard and guarantee to all Americans the constitutional right to equal protection of the laws and (B) will aid in expediting universal compliance with the antisegregation decisions of the Supreme Court.

(b) The Congress further finds that the rights protected by the Constitution, as declared by the antisegregation decisions, will be more widely accepted and more fully enjoyed in all areas of the Nation, and particularly in those areas of the Nation most directly affected by the decisions, when it is generally recognized and understood that—

(1) the Constitution, as declared by the antisegregation decisions, is the supreme law of the land,

(2) all Federal and State officials are bound by their oaths or affirmations to support the Constitution, and

(3) the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government are acting and will continue to act, with such Federal authority as is found necessary, to protect the constitutional rights upheld by those decisions of the judicial branch of the Government.

(c) The Congress further finds that—

(1) the present system whereby individual plaintiffs in the Federal courts bear the burden of protecting constitutional rights, as declared by the antisegregation decisions, is neither the exclusive nor the most effective means of protecting those constitutional rights and the public interest in safeguarding those constitutional rights, and has resulted in local restrictive and punitive measures against the individuals and organizations engaging in, and supporting, efforts in the courts to assert those constitutional rights, and

(2) specific authorization to the executive branch of the Federal Government to act in support of the constitutional rights upheld by the antisegregation decisions (A) will provide a more rational, uniform, just, and effective system of protecting constitutional rights than the present procedure under which the safeguarding of constitutional rights is determined by the varying resources and courage of individuals and organizations and by the varying State statutory restrictions placed upon them, and (B) will render less effective, and hence tend to reduce, hostile community pressures upon individuals and organizations seeking to safeguard constitutional rights.

(d) The Congress hereby recognizes it to be the initial responsibility of all States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units to safeguard the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws as declared by the antisegregation decisions of the Supreme Court and to administer their systems of public education, public transportation, and public recreational facilities in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, but the Federal Government, to maintain a more perfect union, to extend justice, to promote the common defense, and to secure the blessings of liberty to all persons, has a coordinate responsibility to guarantee the constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws, to prevent denials of the right when State or local authorities cannot or will not do so, and thus to enhance the Nation's internal strength and its position throughout the world.

(e) Recognizing its authority and responsibility under the fifth section of the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States and its obligation to uphold the coordinate authority and responsibility of the judicial branch of the Government, the Congress hereby declares its intention that the right to the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Constitution against deprivation by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin and affirmed by the antisegregation decisions of the Supreme Court, shall be protected by all due and reasonable means, and to that end enacts the following provisions of this act.

TITLE II

Technical assistance by Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare

SEC. 201. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") is hereby authorized to render technical assistance to States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units to eliminate denials of constitutional rights in the field of public education by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin and to come into compliance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in the field of public education by—

(a) assembling, publishing, and distributing information which, in his judgment, will prove helpful in obtaining public understanding of, and compliance with, the Constitution and decisions of the Supreme Court in the field of public education;

(b) surveying the progress made in eliminating segregation in public education in various parts of the country and making available to public agencies, private organizations, private individuals, and the general public the results of such surveys, including wherever possible successful case histories of desegregation and the ways and means utilized to bring about desegregation in such instances;

(c) planning, calling, and holding local, State, regional, and national conferences attended by State and local officials, representatives of private organizations, and private citizens, to discuss ways and means of eliminating segregation in public education generally or in any particular State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit;

(d) appointing local, State, regional, and national advisory councils to assist the Secretary in carrying out his duties under this Act and to offer their assistance to any State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit to come into compliance with the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court in the field of public education;

(e) reporting to the Congress, at least semiannually, concerning the progress being made in eliminating segregation in public education in various parts of the country; and

(f) assisting, by such other related means as he deems appropriate, States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units to eliminate segregation in public education.

SEC. 202. The Secretary shall recruit, employ, and train specialists in preparing, putting into effect, and carrying out plans for eliminating segregation in public education and shall offer the services of the specialists to States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units. Upon request of any State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit, the Secretary shall make available to the requesting governmental unit the services of one or more specialists for such periods of time and in such numbers as the Secretary deems necessary and appropriate in the light of the particular needs of the requesting governmental unit.

SEC. 203. (a) The Secretary is authorized to reimburse any State or local official, representative of a private organization, or private citizen who is invited by him to attend any local, State, regional, or national conference held under the authority of section 201(c), and any member of an advisory council appointed under the authority of section 201(d) who is carrying out authorized functions, for travel expenses incurred, and to pay to any such person per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same amounts as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 73b–2) for persons in the Government service serving without compensation.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to reimburse any State or local official who, with the approval of the Secretary, is invited to confer with one or more specialists employed by the Secretary under section 202 for travel expenses incurred in attending such conference, and to pay to any such official per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same amounts as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 73b–2) for persons in the Government service serving without compensation.

SEC. 204. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1958, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years, such amounts not to exceed $2,500,000 in any fiscal year as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this title.

TITLE III

Grants to areas where desegregation in public education is being carried out

SEC. 301. (a) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units which maintained racial segregation in their public schools on May 17, 1954, and which make application for such grants, to assist in meeting the costs of additional educational measures undertaken or to be undertaken to further the process of eliminating segregation in the public schools of the applicant State, municipality, school district, or local governmental unit, while at the same time assuring that existing educational standards will not be lowered.

(b) Grants may be made under this section for—

(1) the cost of employing additional schoolteachers,

(2) the cost of giving to teachers and other school personnel in-service training in dealing with problems incident to desegregation.

(3) the cost of employing specialists in problems incident to desegregation and of providing other assistance to develop understanding by parents, schoolchildren, and the general public of plans and efforts for eliminating segregation in the schools in order to reduce the possibility of community hostility or unlawful resistance to such plans and efforts, and

(4) other costs directly related to the process of eliminating segregation in public schools, including the replacement of State payments to a school district or other political subdivision withdrawn because the applicant district or subdivision is eliminating, or is starting to eliminate segregation.

(c) Grants may also be made under this section for the construction, enlargement, or alteration of school facilities when the Secretary finds that lack or inadequacy of existing facilities makes the carrying out of any reasonable plan for desegregation without lowering existing educational standards impracticable or materially more difficult.

(d) Each application made for a grant under this section shall provide such detailed breakdown of the additional educational measures for which financial assistance is sought as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe.

(e) Each grant under this section shall be made in such amounts and on such terms and conditions as the Secretary shall prescribe, which may include a condition that the applicant expend funds in specified amounts for the purpose for which the grant is made. In determining whether to make a grant, and in fixing the amount thereof and the terms and conditions on which it will be made, the Secretary shall take into consideration—

(1) the amount available for grants under this section and the other applications which are pending before him,

(2) the financial condition of the applicant and the other resources available to it,

(3) the nature, extent, and gravity of its problems incident to desegregation.

(4) whether the additional educational measures undertaken or to be undertaken are reasonably and effectively designed to further the process of eliminating racial segregation, while at the same time assuring that existing educational standards will not be lowered, and

(5) such other factors as he finds relevant.

SEC. 302. The Secretary is further authorized to make grants to public or other nonprofit educational institutions of higher learning to meet or assist in meeting the cost of short-term training courses or institutes, not to exceed four weeks in duration, for personnel of public schools or of educational agencies engaged in or about to undertake desegregation, designed to enable such personnel to deal more effectively with problems incident to desegregation. Such grants may also be used by such institutions to establish and maintain fellowships for such training courses or institutes, covering tuition, fees, and such stipends and allowances (including travel and subsistence expenses) as may be determined by the Secretary.

SEC. 303. Payments of grants under sections 301 and 302 may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement, and at such intervals and on such conditions as the Secretary may determine.

SEC. 304. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years, such sums, not exceeding $40,000,000 for any fiscal year, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

(b) In making grants from funds appropriated for any fiscal year for the purposes specified in section 301(b), the Secretary may disregard applications received after August 31 in that fiscal year, or may subordinate such applications to applications received before that date. In the event that he receives, either before or after that date, applications which he considers would materially contribute to carrying out the purposes of this title, but which he cannot grant because of lack or inadequacy of available funds, he shall forthwith report this fact to the Congress and to the President, together with his recommendation with respect to the appropriation of additional funds.

(c) In the event that the Secretary receives applications for grants for the purpose specified in section 301(c) which he considers would materially contribute to carrying out the purposes of this title, but which he cannot grant because of lack or inadequacy of available funds, he shall forthwith report this fact to the Congress and to the President, together with his recommendation with respect to the appropriation of additional funds.

TITLE IV

Administrative action directed toward eliminating segregation in public education

SEC. 401. The Secretary shall make every effort to persuade States, municipalities, school districts, and other local governmental units to make a start toward eliminating segregation in public education and to carry out in full such programs as they may start, and to this end he shall utilize the authority provided in titles II and III.

SEC. 402. Whenever the Secretary shall find that all efforts under titles II and III and under section 401 of this title have failed, and continue to fail, in bringing about a start toward the elimination of segregation in public education in any State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit, the Secretary is authorized to prepare a tentative plan for the elimination of segregation in public education in such State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit. In preparing such a tentative plan, the Secretary shall seek the advice and assistance of public officials, private organizations, and private citizens in the area and of any local, State, regional, or national advisory council appointed pursuant to section 201(d); and he shall carefully consider such advice and assistance wherever available. Tentative plans prepared by the Secretary under the authority of this section shall take into account the need of the particular area for time to make an orderly adjustment and transition from segregated to desegregated schools.

SEC. 403. (a) Whenever the Secretary has prepared a tentative plan for the elimination of segregation in public education in any State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit, he shall forward the plan to the Governor, mayor, or other appropriate official, as the case may be. If the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit agrees to put into effect the tentative plan as proposed by the Secretary or as modified by the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit with the consent of the Secretary, the Secretary shall utilize the authority granted in titles II and III to assist the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit in putting into effect the tentative plan.

(b) If the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit (1) does not agree to put into effect the tentative plan as proposed by the Secretary or as modified with his consent, or (2) after agreeing to the tentative plan as so proposed or modified, does not, in the judgment of the Secretary, carry out such tentative plan, the Secretary shall hold a public hearing upon the tentative plan. Notice of such hearing shall be given to the local authorities concerned by registered mail and notice shall be given to private organizations and private citizens within the area by publication in one or more newspapers. Local authorities, private organizations, and private citizens shall be permitted to participate in the hearing and present evidence and argument in favor of the tentative plan, in favor of amendments to the tentative plan, or in opposition to the plan or to any plan, but cumulative evidence may be excluded in the discretion of the Secretary. Anyone shall be permitted to file a written statement with the Secretary in addition to, or in lieu of, personal appearance at the public hearing.

(c) After the hearing provided in subsection (b) has been concluded, the Secretary shall prepare and issue an approved plan for eliminating segregation in public education in the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit. He shall publish the approved plan in the Federal Register and in one or more newspapers in the area affected thereby and shall transmit a certified copy thereof to the appropriate official of the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit involved.

(d) In order that the proceedings under this title shall expedite the elimination of segregation in any State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit, the Secretary shall handle all proceedings under this title as expeditiously as possible. The Secretary shall complete any proceedings hereunder within one year from the time that a tentative plan is forwarded to the governor, mayor, or other appropriate official under section 403(a), or, in case a State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit agrees to a tentative plan but does not carry it out, within six months from the time that the Secretary determines that such State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit is not carrying out such tentative plan.

SEC. 404. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years, such amounts as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this title.

SEC. 405. The Secretary is authorized to carry out his responsibilities and exercise his authority under this title and under titles II and III through designated personnel in his own office or through any existing bureau, division, or agency of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare or through a new office created by him for the special purpose of exercising the Secretary's responsibilities hereunder, except that the Secretary shall personally review and sign any approved plan issued under section 403(c).

TITLE V

Authorization to the Attorney General in the field of public education

SEC. 501. (a) Whenever (1) the Secretary has published in the Federal Register an approved plan for the elimination of segregation in public education in any State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit pursuant to section 403(c), (2) the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit has rejected the plan or has refused or failed to act in accordance therewith, and (3) the Secretary has certified to the Attorney General that all efforts to secure compliance with the Constitution and the Supreme Court's decisions by conciliation, persuasion, education, and assistance under titles II, III, and IV have failed, the Attorney General of the United States is authorized to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action or other proceeding for preventive relief, including an application for an injunction or other order, against the appropriate officials of the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit, and any individual or individuals acting in concert with such officials to enforce compliance with the approved plan.

(b) The Attorney General is authorized to move to dismiss or discontinue any action brought under subsection (a), or to propose or to agree to a decree adopting a plan for elimination of segregation in public education which is different from the approved plan, whenever he determines that the State, municipality, school district, or other local governmental unit is making, or is prepared to make, a prompt and reasonable start toward full compliance with the Constitution and the Supreme Court's decisions in the field of education and to work toward full compliance with all deliberate speed.

(c) Any interested party may, with the leave of the court, intervene in any action brought under subsection (a), and the court shall consider any proposals by the intervenors, as well as by the defendant or defendants, in determining its final decree.

TITLE VI

Other authorizations to the Attorney General

SEC. 601. (a) Whenever the Attorney General receives a signed complaint that any person or group of persons is being deprived of, or is being threatened with the loss of, the right to the equal protection of the laws by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin and whenever the Attorney General certifies that, in his judgment, such person or group of persons is unable for any reason to seek effective legal protection for the right to the equal protection of the laws, the Attorney General is authorized to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action or other proceeding for preventive relief, including an application for an injunction or other order, against any individual or individuals who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, deprives or threatens to deprive such person or group of persons of the right to equal protection of the laws by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin and against any individual or individuals acting in concert with them.

(b) A person or group of persons shall be deemed unable to seek effective legal protection for the right to the equal protection of the laws within the meaning of subsection (a) not only when such person or group of persons is financially unable to bear the expenses of the litigation, but also when there is reason to believe that the institution of such litigation would jeopardize the employment or other economic activity of, or might result in physical harm or economic damage to, such person or group of persons or their families.

(c) Nothing contained in titles IV and V shall limit the authority of the Attorney General to institute and maintain an action under subsection (a).

SEC. 602. The Attorney General is authorized to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action or other proceeding for preventive relief, including an application for injunction or other order, (1) against any person or persons preventing or hindering, or threatening to prevent or hinder, or conspiring to prevent or hinder, any Federal, State, or local official from according any person or group of persons the right to the equal protection of the laws without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin, or (2) against any person or persons preventing or hindering, or threatening to prevent or hinder, or conspiring to prevent or hinder the execution of any court order protecting the right to the equal protection of the laws without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin.

SEC. 603. The Attorney General is authorized, upon receipt of a signed complaint, to institute for or in the name of the United States, a civil action or other proceeding for preventive relief, including an application for injunction or other order, against any individual or individuals who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or subdivision or instrumentality thereof, deprives or threatens to deprive any person or group of persons or association of persons of any right guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution because such person or group of persons or association of persons has opposed or opposes the denial of the equal protection of the laws to others because of race, color, religion, or national origin.

SEC. 604. Whenever a suit is brought in any district court of the United States seeking relief from the deprivation of the right of equal protection of the laws because of race, color, religion, or national origin, the Attorney General is authorized to intervene in such action with all the rights of a party thereto and to seek compliance with any lawful order issued by such district court.

TITLE VII

Miscellaneous provisions

SEC. 701. The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of proceedings instituted under sections 501, 601, 602, and 603 of this Act and shall exercise the same without regard to whether any administrative or other remedies that may be provided by law shall have been exhausted and, in the case of proceedings instituted under sections 601 and 602, without regard to whether any administrative proceeding is pending or contemplated under title IV, it being the purpose of title IV to expedite, not delay, the elimination of segregation in public education throughout the Nation. In any proceeding hereunder, the United States shall be liable for costs the same as a private person.

SEC. 702. Nothing in this Act or in any administrative proceeding hereunder shall be construed to impair any right guaranteed by the Constitution or laws of the United States or any remedies already existing for their protection or enforcement, nor to prevent any private individual or organization from acting to enforce or safeguard any constitutional right in any manner now permitted by law.

SEC. 703. If any provision of this Act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this Act or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

FULL TEXT OF LETTER FROM SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS TO ATTORNEY GENERAL WILLIAM P. ROGERS

DECEMBER 2, 1958.

HON. WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General of the United States, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. ROGERS: I was greatly pleased to read the recent press accounts reporting that you are planning to ask Congress for additional civil rights legislation.

In my opinion, this is one of the most urgent questions before the country, and Congress should have the best counsel it can secure from the executive departments, who share the responsibility for assuring to all our citizens the equal protection of the laws.

In this connection, I am writing now to bring to your attention a bill which was introduced in the 85th Congress by 16 Senators and 13 Members of the House of Representatives, which embodies a new approach to the safeguarding of constitutional rights in the field of public education. This measure also, more clearly and directly than in the original civil rights bill of 1957, provides for preventive relief against the denials of equal protection on account of race, color, religion, or national origin. It was S. 3257 in the Senate and H.R. 10601 (and 12 other separate bills) in the House.

It is my earnest hope that you will give the most careful consideration to the proposals in this legislation in working out the recommendations which you are formulating for the new Congress.

The broad bipartisan support which this legislation had is indicated by the names of its sponsors in the Senate, who included in addition to myself: Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. IVES, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. DIRKSEN, Mr. MORSE, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. CLARK, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. BEALL, and Mr. PASTORE.

The Representatives who introduced the bills in the House were Representative DIGGS, Representative O'HARA of Illinois, Representative ROOSEVELT, Representative CELLER, Representative PORTER, Representative REUSS, Representative SHELLEY, Representative THOMPSON of New Jersey, Representative UDALL, Representative VANIK, Representative MCCARTHY, Representative DAWSON (in a revised form), and Representative ADDONIZIO. As you can see, the chairmen of two important House committees were among this number.

The basic logic of the proposal is a greater acceptance of Federal responsibility for ending denials of equal protection of the laws and fuller cooperation with State and local governments for that purpose.

In the area of public education, where these rights are being most warmly contested today, the bill provides for technical assistance (title II), financial grants (title III), and administrative procedures for preparing desegregation plans (title IV). Thus by information, education, conciliation, persuasion, financial assistance and desegregation plans developed with the fullest possible local participation, it would foster compliance with the Constitution and the historic decisions of the Supreme Court. It does so with due regard for the Court's orders concerning deliberate speed. When voluntary compliance is not forthcoming, new court proceedings for preventive relief are also provided (title V).

Preventive action by the Attorney General in "equal protection" cases generally is also authorized, but only on complaints signed by injured persons and where the Attorney General finds that these persons are unable to bring the action themselves (title VI). Important supplementary safeguards for these and other, existing remedies are also specified in title VII. The preambles outline the factual, legal and moral basis for the proposed legislation.

This bill has been prepared with a keen awareness of the complexity and national scope of the underlying issues, but with a deep conviction that our international position and the unfortunate events in Arkansas, Virginia and elsewhere all give a new urgency to such action. We trust you will find it a clearer and more constructive approach to the protection of the vital constitutional rights dealt with in part III which had your support but was stricken from last year's bill.

Senator HENNINGS' attempts to schedule hearings on this measure in the 85th Congress were blocked by a bare majority of his subcommittee. But Representative CELLER conducted several days of hearings in the House. For your information, I am enclosing a careful statement about the bill prepared for submission to the House Judiciary Committee by the thoughtful, former chairman of the Southern Regional Council, Mr. Marion A. Wright, of North Carolina.

I know that the congressional sponsors of this legislation will greatly appreciate your giving these proposals your most careful study and consideration.

With best wishes.

Faithfully,

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

[From the Southern School News, January 1959]

SEGREGATION-DESEGREGATION NO NEARER SOLUTION AT YEAR'S END

(The crisis over school segregation-desegregation remained far from a solution after 12 months of headline-making developments, including the first school closings, in 1958. Here is a year-end review compiled from reports by Southern School News correspondents.)

ALABAMA

(1) The State's 1955 Pupil Placement Law was held not unconstitutional "on its face" by a three-judge U.S. District Court panel in Birmingham May 9 and by the U.S. Supreme Court November 24. Official reaction to the validation was that it was a victory for segregation. But privately some officials conceded that token integration might be necessary to avoid the law's being ruled unconstitutional in application. No official, however, has publicly endorsed even token integration. All are pledged to total resistance.

(2) The segregation issue dominated the Alabama Democratic primary. Atty. Gen. John Patterson, pointing to his record of legal action against the NAACP and other Negro groups in the State, was elected Governor. States' Righters captured control of the State Democratic Executive Committee in a surprising upset in the May and June primaries.

(3) The U.S. Supreme Court June 30 nullified a $100,000 contempt fine against the Alabama NAACP. The fine had been imposed by Montgomery Circuit Judge Walter B. Jones after the NAACP refused to submit its membership records to the court.

(4) Attorney general-elect MacDonald Gallion announced in October an "Alabama Education Endowment Foundation" had been formed as a standby measure in case schools are closed because of integration rulings.

(5) The Commission on Civil Rights held its first public hearings in Montgomery December 8 to 9, to investigate charges that Negroes had been denied the right to vote in Macon, Dallas, Wilcox, Bullock, Barbour, and Lowndes Counties. Circuit Judge George Wallace refused to answer the Commission's subpena and faced a contempt ruling as did five registration officials from the affected counties. Negroes appearing at the 2-day hearing told of delay and frustration in their efforts to be registered.

ARKANSAS

(1) The four Little Rock high schools were closed September 15 by order of Gov. Orval Faubus to keep Central High from being desegregated. The Little Rock Private School Corp. was chartered September 17 and began operating a private school for white pupils.

(2) For the first time extreme segregationists dominated all elections in the State except the school board elections in December. Gov. Orval Faubus swamped two opponents in the July 29 primary and Jim Johnson Crossett, segregationist leader, defeated a veteran member of the Arkansas Supreme Court.

In a special election September 27, Little Rock school district residents voted 19,470 to 7,561 against school integration. Dr. DALE ALFORD, outspoken segregationist member of the Little Rock School Board, ran as a write-in candidate in the general election against Congressman Brooks Hays, a moderate on the racial question, and defeated him.

In the school elections December 6: At Little Rock, three of five candidates called integrationist by Faubus were elected and three on the Citizens Council slate were elected. At Van Buren, the president of the new Citizens Council ran for the school board but lost. At Hoxie, a candidate supported by the segregationists in the forefront of the trouble there in 1955 ran for the board and was defeated.

(3) In a special session starting August 26, the general assembly adopted 17 new laws, all designed to preserve segregation or linked to that purpose. One (Act 4) gives the Governor power to close any public school for a variety of reasons and at his discretion.

(4) Desegregation cannot be postponed because of popular and demonstrated opposition to it, the Eighth Circuit Appeals Court and the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in overthrowing a 2½-year delay in integration as requested by the Little Rock School Board. The appeals court ruled August 18 and the U.S. Supreme Court September 29 against the delay granted June 20 by Judge Harry J. Lemley.

Ruling November 10 that the Little Rock school district could not lease its public high schools, while closed, to a private school, the appeals court said desegregation at Little Rock must proceed, partly on orders the school board would receive from the district judge and partly on the board's own initiative.

(5) Little Rock Central High School, completing a year of desegregation under Federal troop guard, graduated one Negro and 601 whites May 27. After the Alford-Hays election, the five Little Rock board members except ALFORD resigned in a body on November 13, calling their position hopeless and helpless.

(6) Van Buren and Ozark both had outbreaks of mild trouble in September in their desegregated high schools. At Van Buren the 13 Negro students returned to school, after failing to get Federal court help, on September 22, and no more difficulty has been reported. At Ozark the three Negro girls left school September 8 and have not returned.

DELAWARE

(1) The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review a Federal district court order calling on the State board of education to draw up a desegregation plan. On November 19 the district court ordered the State board to submit a desegregation plan by March 4 for court approval. The State board indicated it would comply with the order.

(2) Apparent approval was given a Dover desegregation plan, whereby Negro pupils are admitted at the ninth-grade level to academic courses only. Dover's plan was approved originally by the State board in 1954, and has not since been broadened to include elementary grades or to admit Negroes to other courses at the high-school level. State Board President Vincent Theisen said the board will not include Dover in the plan it submits to the court.

(3) An integrated school was opened in a segregated district on Dover Air Force Base.

(4) The Deleware General Assembly's most active segregationist, as well as the one who fought hardest to prevent anti-integration legislation, were defeated in State elections.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

(1) The annual peak enrollment census of District schools showed a record high pupil membership of 114,219, including 84,650 Negroes and 29,569 whites. The figures represented a decrease of 2,434 in the number of white students and an increase of 5,539 in Negro schools.

(2) On February 28, Dr. Hobart M. Corning retired after 12 years as Washington school superintendent. In his final report, he called desegregation "the most significant, far-reaching, and difficult problem" of his tenure of office.

To succeed Dr. Corning the school board named Dr. Carl F. Hansen, an assistant school superintendent who had played a major role in setting up the desegregation program.

(3) The lag in achievement continued to be the school system's major concern. In January, officials disclosed that almost 50 percent of Washington schoolchildren fall into the low normal or poor risk groups in reading readiness, though the majority are average or above in intelligence. Standardized test results made public in June showed gains in most areas, but left District averages trailing behind national norms.

(4) In July, Superintendent Hansen announced an all-out drive to bring student achievement levels up to national standards. With the new school year, special honors classes, previously operated in the senior high schools under the four-track plan, were extended down to the junior high level.

FLORIDA

(1) For the first time since the University of Florida opened its doors a century ago, a Negro student is attending the law school at Gainesville. University officials said there had been no repercussions or incidents.

(2) In Dade County, the board of public instruction ordered studies to determine if the Orchard Villa School, in an area rapidly changing from white to Negro, should be integrated. Studies are still in progress, but members of the school board said consideration is being given to voluntary integration, with both white and Negro parents having full and free choice between Orchard Villa and segregated schools.

(3) Two suits seeking to end school segregation are close to decision. In the Dade County case evidence has been taken and briefs filed. The case already has been to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals which ordered trial on the merits. In the Palm Beach County case the court of appeals ordered the school authorities to produce an acceptable plan for integration. So far none has been forthcoming.

A third suit has just been filed in Hillsborough County (Tampa).

(4) With the biennial session of the legislature scheduled for May 1959, house and senate members are working on stronger segregation measures. Senate leadership has announced that emphasis will be on setting up a State-aided private school system, if necessary, to avoid court-ordered integration.

GEORGIA

(1) A desegregation suit was filed in January against the Atlanta Board of Education. Ten Negroes asked on behalf of their 28 minor children that segregation be ended throughout the system. Federal court judges in Atlanta promised a decision in the case before September 1959.

(2) Lt. Gov. Ernest Vandiver, an ardent segregationist who has promised to use State troopers and State guardsmen to keep schools segregated, was elected Governor on November 4.

(3) In November and December, Georgians debated local option on public school closings even as segregation leaders showed concern over court decisions endangering private school plans.

(4) The Georgia Commission on Education came under fire during primary campaigning, and its director resigned in July after charges were made that the commission was using State personnel and facilities for political purposes.

KENTUCKY

(1) Kentucky in June quietly completed the third year of its school desegregation program, in September increased the number of desegregated districts by 15 percent—to 123 of its 175 bi-racial districts—with brief and minor disturbances in two districts—and reported over 80 percent of the State's school-age Negroes now included in desegregated districts.

(2) Gov. A. B. Chandler continued to reflect an official climate of compliance by (a) praising the State's record in desegregation, (b) criticizing Arkansas Governor Faubus for his noncompliance in Little Rock, and (c) seeking the 1960 Democratic Presidential nomination as a moderate thinker on integration but one who believes the Supreme Court's ruling on school desegregation must be obeyed.

(3) Kentucky Negroes won new prominence in educational and legislative fields. For the first time, Louisville elected a Negro, Woodford R. Porter, to its school board. For the first time, the legislature named a Negro, the Reverend Felix S. Anderson, chairman of a standing committee of the house of representatives. Governor Chandler reappointed the only Negro member of the State board of education. She is Mrs. John H. Walls.

(4) Two successive Jefferson County grand juries rejected citizens council's charges of crime and official misconduct in some of the desegregated Louisville schools. One report endorsed instead the Louisville Board of Education policies and the manner in which they were applied, and warned parents against persons who seek to influence their children in such a manner as to purvey hatred and defiance of law and order.

(5) Church officials announced that two Methodist colleges—Wesleyan, at Owensboro, and Lindsey Wilson, at Columbia—would be desegregated in 1959. This would bring the State's total of desegregated colleges to 30 of 40, including all tax-supported institutions and more than a score of private and denominational colleges and seminaries.

LOUISIANA

(1) More than 50 Negroes were admitted, along with 1,400 white students, to the new branch of the Louisiana State University at New Orleans. The admissions, result of a Federal court order, mean that half of Louisiana's eight tax-supported, formerly all-white colleges and universities have begun desegregation.

(2) In other legal actions, Federal courts (a) issued a permanent injunction against segregated public schools in Orleans Parish, a decision that will be appealed; (b) declared unconstitutional a State law that would prevent Negroes and white participating against each other in sports events; (c) declared unconstitutional laws requiring segregation in public transportation.

The board of commissioners of city park at New Orleans, largest public recreation area in the city, abolished racial segregation on December 21. "This means," said an official statement of the board, "that Negroes are now permitted to use all the park facilities—the tennis courts, the baseball fields, the golf courses, the amusement rides—all facilities."

The decision followed by 4 days the action of the U.S. Supreme Court in reaffirming for a second time an injunction prohibiting segregation at city park. The case has been in litigation since 1949.

(4) The Louisiana Legislature adopted five new laws designed to preserve segregation in the schools and sent a constitutional amendment for that purpose to the voters. The laws (a) permit the governor to close schools ordered to desegregate; (b) permit private operation of public schools in the event of desegregation; and (c) set up criteria, other than race, for pupil assignment. The amendment, approved in referendum November 4, permits the legislature to make public funds available for operation of private, nonsectarian schools.

(5) The State Democratic executive committee voted to oust Camille F. Gravel, Jr., as Louisiana's national committeeman. The Democratic National Committee in December voted to retain Gravel as the member from Louisiana. The State committee charged Gravel espoused integration, but Gravel said he merely supported the national Democratic civil rights position.

MARYLAND

(1) Figures released by the State Department of Education in March and again in November indicated the admission of Negro pupils to white schools was proceeding at roughly 5,000 a year, with increases of about 1,000 recorded annually in the counties and the remainder in Baltimore city.

(2) The Supreme Court in June declined to review the Harford County school case, letting stand a 7-year desegregation program that includes a special screening process for Negroes seeking to enter white high schools in advance of the established timetable.

(3) The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals in November upheld Chief District Judge Roszel C. Thomsen's ruling that a Negro plaintiff had a personal constitutional right to be admitted to a white 12th grade in St. Mary's County even though the county's desegregation program only extended to the 9th grade.

(4) While voluntary desegregation is the more common policy in Maryland, compulsory integration was effected in four counties in September as school officials moved to close small Negro units.

MISSISSIPPI

(1) No suits have been filed to break down the State's segregation barriers in schools or other fields.

(2) The Reverend Clennon King, former professor at Alcorn College for Negroes, attempted unsuccessfully in June to enroll at the all-white University of Mississippi for the summer session. He later said he would attempt to enroll his daughter in a white elementary school but nothing came of it.

(3) A three-judge Federal court at Jackson dismissed a suit by the Reverend H. D. Darby, Negro, of Jeff Davis County, challenging the constitutionality of Mississippi voter registration statutes as discriminatory against Negroes.

MISSOURI

(1) In January the St. Louis Board of Education put into effect its new three-track plan for high schools. The plan was designed to provide educational apportunities corresponding to different levels of achievement. While the plan had no official connection with integration of St. Louis public schools, now more than 46 percent nonwhite, it was regarded as useful in coping with problems caused by educational and background differences between students.

(2) On April 14 Missouri's new State commission on human rights was sworn in at Jefferson City. Task of the 11-member group is to receive and investigate complaints of racial or ethnic discrimination, and recommend means of eliminating injustices.

(3) On June 27, U.S. District Judge Roy W. Harper, at St. Louis ruled that the Moberly school district, in north central Missouri, had not shown discrimination in employing its faculty for the 1955–56 term. Eight Negro teachers had brought suit for damages and sought an injunction against the town's school board, charging they lost their jobs because they were Negroes. In October, seven of the teachers filed notice of appeal.

(4) Three more school districts in September inaugurated desegregation programs. They are Booneville, Brookfield, and Keytesville. This brought to 211 the number of biracial districts desegregated, out of the State's total of 244 districts which have both white and Negro pupils within their boundaries. It was estimated that 95 percent of the State's 79,000 Negro pupils are in districts which have begun or completed the desegregation process.

NORTH CAROLINA

(1) Token integration continued in three North Carolina cities during 1958. In all, 11 Negro pupils completed their first year in mixed classes in Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem, and one of them was graduated from a Greensboro high school. Thirteen enrolled in the same three cities in the fall.

(2) Negroes continued their legal attacks against the State pupil assignment law and other laws which make up the North Carolina Pearsall Plan. Developments included Federal district court decisions requiring exhaustion of administrative remedies in the Raleigh case and the Montgomery County cases, and the filing of new cases in Durham and Caswell counties.

(3) On January 18, near the village of Maxton, a Ku Klux Klan rally was broken up by several hundred Lumbee Indians with gunfire.

(4) A group of Haliwa Indians, who objected to their children attending Negro schools as they have done in the past, applied for tuition payments under provision of the Pearsall plan to help finance a private school they have set up.

OKLAHOMA

(1) Financial pressure on smaller biracial school districts forced some of them to give up their separate schools out of budgeting necessity. Bristow desegregated its schools for 1958–59 and Lenapah extended integration to the elementary grades at the same time. Two Little Dixie districts, Fox and Graham, sought continued State financing of segregated schools but were turned down.

(2) In one of the few instances of violence which have accompanied desegregation in Oklahoma a school board member at Springer, in Carter County, was beaten in August by one of a group protesting the board's plans to integrate for 1958–59.

(3) A Federal judge ruled in October the State is under no mandate to maintain only integrated schools. He made the statement in denying a request for an injunction against a Negro principal who tried to influence Negro children to remain in his school. However, he ordered four Negro pupils admitted to a white school in the same district.

(4) The total of Oklahoma school districts which have begun the desegregation process rose to 238 with the beginning of a new school year in September.

SOUTH CAROLINA

(1) January 1958 brought a flurry of applications from Negro students seeking enrollment at the University of South Carolina, but none was accepted and the year ended without incident or litigation.

(2) In June, the State board of education restored Allen University, a Negro Methodist college of Columbia, to approved standing for teacher certification of its graduates, thus ending a 9-month controversy based primarily on Governor Timmerman's repeated contention that Communist-connected persons were on the Allen faculty.

(3) A Cherokee County jury in July acquitted two persons on trial for the November 1957, dynamiting of the residence of a Gaffney physician and his wife. The wife, Mrs. J. H. Sanders, had contributed an article to a booklet entitled, "South Carolinians Speak," compiled by five ministers as a reflection of moderate sentiment on the question of race relations. Mrs. Sanders had suggested in her contribution that racial integration might be started at the first grade.

(4) In August, two new petitions seeking integration of public schools in Clarendon County were filed with school authorities of the county. They were from areas other than Summerton, from which arose one of the cases (Briggs v. Elliott) ruled upon by the U.S. Supreme Court in May 1954. The new petitions were rejected.

TENNESSEE

(1) Federal district court on June 19 approved a grade-a-year desegregation plan for Nashville city schools with liberal provisions for pupil transfers. Schools opened uneventfully September 8 with 34 Negroes enrolled in first and second grades at 7 previously all-white schools. The total later dropped to 28.

(2) Clinton High School, in its third year of desegregation, was badly damaged by three dynamite blasts on October 5. A dynamite explosion damaged the Jewish Community Center at Nashville March 16, and anonymous telephone calls related the action to school desegregation. Both crimes remained unsolved.

(3) Desegregation of Memphis State University was postponed another year, until next September.

(4) Meharry Medical College, an endowed institution at Nashville which graduated more than half the Negro physicians and dentists now practicing in the United States, disclosed it had quietly enrolled two white students in September 1957, its first.

(5) Racist Frederick John Kasper, free after serving time in a Federal penitentiary on a conviction for contempt of court in the Clinton disorders, was found guilty on November 10 of inciting to riot in the 1957 school disturbances at Nashville. He appealed a 6-months sentence and $500 fine.

TEXAS

(1) Dallas, a city held to be a key to further desegregation in Texas, delayed the step at least until 1959 pending court action. The Federal courts have ordered Dallas to desegregate with deliberate speed. But the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in May dismissed the Dallas board's effort to get a ruling on its legal dilemmas involving a conflict of State and Federal authority. In November, State District Judge W. L. Thornton also dismissed the case.

(2) Houston, the Nation's largest segregated school district, also under court order to desegregate, took some tentative steps toward integration, such as seeking to improve the teaching of Negro children.

(3) At the November election, a Negro, Mrs. Charles E. White, was elected to the Houston school board.

(4) Bloomington, a small south Texas district, desegregated its schools by election in August; while voters at Boerne, in southwest Texas, defeated a proposal to admit the town's only two Negro students to an all-white school. A special teacher is employed for the two Negroes.

VIRGINIA

(1) Nine Virginia public schools, with a total enrollment of 12,729 pupils, were closed in the Old Dominion's battle against school integration. The schools—located in Norfolk, Charlottesville, and Warren County—automatically shut down under State law after local school boards were forced by Federal courts to enroll Negroes in what formerly were all white institutions.

As the year ended, about 10,000 of the displaced students were attending classes in community tutoring groups, private schools especially set up for the purpose, or in other public schools.

(2) There was a sudden rise, late in the year, of widespread talk of a possible shift in the State's massive resistance policy. Some former all-out segregationist leaders began urging adoption of new laws which would permit integration at a locality's option but which would provide tuition grants for children who preferred to attend private segregated schools.

(3) On the legal front, Federal courts ordered Arlington County to admit Negroes into white schools in February 1959, and gave Prince Edward County until 1965 to begin integration. Desegregation suits against Richmond, Alexandria, and Newport News are pending.

(5) Residents of Norfolk, on November 18, voted 12,340 to 8,712 against asking the Governor to permit the reopening of Norfolk's six closed schools on an integrated basis.

WEST VIRGINIA

(1) The public schools opened in September in an atmosphere of calm. For the second straight year all 43 biracial districts and 4 of the all-white districts operated under policies of desegregation. Where protest demonstrations had occurred in 1957 there were no repeats in 1958.

(2) On November 10, an explosion caused an estimated $200,000 damage to a desegregated school at Osage in Monongalia County. Despite good race relations in the community, the school blast generally is assumed to have stemmed from the segregation-desegregation factor.

(3) Earlier, in January and February, several schools burned on the opposite side of the State. There was evidence to link the fires with the fact the schools were desegregated.

(4) State School Supt. R. Virgil Rohrbough on August 1 named a Negro supervisor, C. C. Carter, of Mercer County, to work among Negro groups in the State. Carter's chief duty will be to explain the process of desegregation. In some areas Negroes oppose the program, and in one community, Edwight, white junior high school patrons petitioned for desegregation of schools over Negro objection, to give white children access to the superior Negro school facility.

THE SEGREGATIONISTS GO NORTH

(By Helen Fuller)

The States of the Deep South are shifting their strategy of "massive resistance" from defense to attack. They will lose their leader, Virginia's Governor Almond, on January 19 (Robert E. Lee's birthday) if the courts, as expected, on that day declare void the laws Virginia passed to evade the 1954 decision desegregating the public schools. But the six remaining Confederate States which have refused to take even one step toward compliance with the 1954 Court order are resolved not to go Virginia's way without much more of a struggle. There is plenty of fight left in the Eastlands, the Russells, the Talmadges and the young fire-eating Governors of Alabama and Georgia. And they are now about to take the battle into enemy territory. A second battle of Gettysburg is about to begin, this one to be fought with the techniques of psychological warfare, aimed at the public outside the South, the Congress and conservative leaders in both major political parties. Object: to win sympathy for the segregationist view behind the enemy lines, support for curbing the powers of the Supreme Court by law, and agreement to nullify the New Reconstruction of 1954 as the Compromise of 1877 nullified Reconstruction before.

The first task—making common cause with new allies outside their region—the New Confederates approach with great zest, for most of them sincerely believe that down inside most people outside the South feel toward the Negro about the way southerners do. The trouble, they feel, is that the average person above the Mason-Dixon line doesn't understand how fair and kind—how separate but equal—the South is willing to be. The misunderstanding comes, they further believe, largely because of the "paper curtain" which the northern press has placed around the South; "all they print is the gory stories." "Lay your case before the American people," Senator EASTLAND recently assured the convention of the Mississippi Farm Bureau Federation in Jackson, "and you will be surprised to find how similar their opinions are to those of your own." And so the massive resisters have decided to tell the rest of America "just the honest story," "with no Bilbo business."

This southern campaign to convert the North, East and West will not be of the order of magnitude of a Billy Graham crusade, but it is well-organized and well-financed. Some States have already allocated public funds to propaganda bureaus which are pouring out pamphlets and "fact sheets" on the shortcomings of the Negro and the Supreme Court. Over the great seal of the State of Louisiana, the Joint State Legislative Committee, headed by Sen. W. M. Rainach, who speaks for the Louisiana White Citizens Councils in the legislature and is a leading candidate for Governor next year, has printed as a full-page advertisement in the New York Herald-Tribune a message addressed "To the People of New York City" on "The Position of the South on Race Relations." The committee subsequently "distributed several thousand tear sheets of the ad to key officials, publications and organizations throughout the United States," Senator Rainach says. "And after running out of all the tear sheets except a handful, we reprinted the ad in mail sheet form and distributed several thousand of these sheets also."

Senator EASTLAND is urging that the other defiant States go and do likewise. Citing the Herald-Tribune ad as an example of the wise use of public funds, EASTLAND told the Farm Bureau convention that "the southern people have got to lay their case before the Nation, and we must use our tax money to get the job done."

There are leaders in all six bitter-end States who agree. Out of Alabama has come a new "Putnam Letter Committee," headed by James E. Simpson, leading Birmingham Dixiecrat and lawyer for some of the biggest of Alabama's "Big Mules." The committee's purpose is to publicize a beguiling "Dear Mr. President" letter signed by Carleton Putnam, a northerner who has spent many years as an airline's executive in the South. The Putnam letter has already been published as a large ad in the New York Times and is to be placed in newspapers all over the country. Arguing that the Court decision in the school case is personal opinion, not law, and that equal protection under law is not a right in the United States but a social privilege, the letter declares:

"Neither the North nor the Court has any holy mandate inherent in the trend of the times or the progress of liberalism to reform society in the South. In the matter of schools, rights to equal education are inseparably bound up with rights to freedom of association and, in the South, at least, may require that both be considered simultaneously. (In using the word 'association' here I mean the right to associate with whom you please, and the right not to associate with whom you please.)"

The Putnam committee raises funds privately for its promotion. But Florida Legislator William H. Reedy shares EASTLAND'S view that such projects are public business. He proposes a program of southern aid to Federal education on the southern view, to be supported by appropriations of $1 million per year from each State participating. "The South must sell its ideas the way Hollywood producers sell starlets," Reedy says. And the conference of southern Governors has invited him to its next meeting to discuss details.

(Georgia's Senator RICHARD RUSSELL is for educating the rest of the country to southern problems, too, but he would let those on the receiving end pay for the privilege. He promises us a bill this year to provide Federal aid to southern Negroes who wish to move to States with smaller Negro populations in order "to give each State an equal share of the race problem.")

The funds the South is willing to invest in enlightenment of the North are supposed to yield dividends this very year in the form of aid toward passage of the Smith bill to curb the Supreme Court.

First introduced in 1955, H.R. 3—which would repeal the long-standing doctrine of Federal preemption and place primary jurisdiction in the State courts unless specifically withheld by Congress—passed the House last year by a large majority of southern Democrats and conservative Republicans (241 to 155). In the end-of-session confusion the Senate defeated it by only one vote. Representative HOWARD SMITH, Democrat of Virginia, has reintroduced H.R. 3 in the new Congress and because of his position as chairman of the powerful Rules Committee should be able to push it through the House again, even though the measure has lost supporters because of Republican casualties in the November election. For the same reason the new Senate should be more opposed to passage of H.R. 3 than the old, but the foes of the Court are also vastly more determined.

The Smith bill of itself is an important southern objective, as a symbol of antagonism to the Court's leadership in forcing the segregation issue in the most direct way since Reconstruction days. But even should passage fail again, a close, hard-fought decision would be worth the price of the propaganda effort required to produce it. A lengthy battle over the Court-curbing measure in advance of consideration of new civil rights enforcement legislation—which southerners could easily manage with their command of traffic through their committee chairmanships—would contribute to their larger objective: Preventing the Congress from adding the force of its approval to the position of the Court on desegregating public schools "with all deliberate speed."

At all costs the massive resisters must prevent reenforcements from reaching the judiciary, which stands today as the lone leader in the New Reconstruction. The murmurs of encouragement to the courts which have risen faintly from the Department of Justice and the ill-calculated relief offered by the President in the Little Rock affair hardly qualify as major assists. Congress, in effect has remained neutral. And it is imperative for those who defy the Court to keep it that way. LYNDON JOHNSON helped a lot by taming the new Senate a few hours after it walked into his cage, and so leaving the filibuster in good working condition. But a hard-fought, even if finally losing battle to punish the Court for its recent conduct would offer invaluable opportunities to make sure that Congress does not suddenly decide to get behind the Supreme Court. In the midst of debate and backstage maneuvers there is always room for wheeling and dealing. When the vote is close, trades can sometimes be made which change other close votes on other days. In such a situation the South's polished professionals would surprise everyone if they walked out of the cloakrooms without a stack of I O U's payable when Federal enforcement of school desegregation became the question before the House.

If the States which shout "Never!" can prevent the 86th Congress from passing legislation supporting the Court, they will be free to attempt the next huge step in their plan for total escape from the toils of the New Reconstruction: Persuade the reformers to give up. Historically, this is not so farfetched as it sounds. The ephemeral historic importance "of such earlier landmarks as the Fugutive Slave Law of 1850, the Dred Scott decision of 1857, the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and 1875, the Fourteenth Amendment of 1867, or, for that matter, the Volstead Act of 1919—all of which were in some degree nullified by events or public sentiment—should remind us," Vann Woodward, the leading historian of the American Reconstruction period remarks. "* * * how precarious are the fortunes of American statesmanship when it operates against the mass opposition of a significant section of the country."

"Reconstruction," Professor Woodward observes, affords the most extreme example in our history of an all-out effort by the majority to impose its will upon a recalcitrant and unwilling minority region. * * * In spite of the relative weakness and helplessness of the resistant South, in spite of the determined idealism of the northern reformers * * * the fact is that the great experiment ended in disillusionment and default. The gains made on paper were never fully implemented in practice, or they were eroded away by compromise, concession and "interpretation." Apathy and indifference replaced the original idealism of the reformers. It was the will of the defeated, discredited and for a time, helpless South that prevailed in the end.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE.—Helen Fuller, a southerner by birth and education, has just returned from a survey through the Southern States. This is the third of several interpretative reports.

EXCERPT FROM STATEMENT OF THE ADVISORY COUNCIL TO THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE ISSUED DECEMBER 7, 1958

CIVIL RIGHTS

The Democratic Party reaffirms its traditional belief in the dignity of each individual human being and that every citizen must be guaranteed his full rights and opportunities under the Constitution.

Appropriate congressional action appears to be necessary to make the deliberations and investigations of the Civil Rights Commission meaningful.

There should be a thorough review of the enforcement by the Attorney General of rights of Americans under existing civil rights laws, including the newly enacted Federal laws to protect voting rights.

The Attorney General of the United States should be authorized to start civil injunctions suits against those who deprive persons of their rights to equal protection of the laws, on account of race, color, religion, or natural origin.

There is an obligation to meet the challenge of closed schools and potentially uneducated children as a result of the defiance of the law of the land by a few State and local officials. The present crisis over the refusals of local officials to comply with the orders and decrees of Federal courts has not been met by firm and constructive leadership from the President or his subordinates. It is to be hoped that such legislative action will be taken as will aid, assist and encourage the earliest possible reopening of schools now closed, and will prevent the closing of other schools.

Federal legislation is needed to outlaw the use of the mails for the distribution of literature designed to inflame racial and religious prejudices for the purpose of inciting violence such as that which has led to the recent wave of bombings and violence.

EXHIBIT 8

INTEGRATION TRENDS IN THE SOUTH

(Address by Marion A. Wright of Linville Falls, N.C., November 19, 1958, before National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials at Pittsburgh, Pa.)

This experience has for me the spice of novelty. Those of us in the South who occasionally talk to southern audiences have always the consciousness that, while the handful of people out front may approve, the community most assuredly does not. The walls hardly deflect the outer waves of hostility. One has to reflect upon the jeopardy to a tax-exempt status in which his words may place certain organizations. There is always the possibility that one or two grim and vengeful spies may be present to record and distort his more innocuous platitudes for the white citizens councils. It is, therefore, a relief to look over this happy and well-fed group and see no face that could remotely be described as grim or vengeful.

I am not, however, so far carried away by this delightful circumstance that I omit a customary precaution. No representative of NAIRO or the Southern Regional Council or any other group has conspired or confederated with me in the preparation of these remarks or has any responsibility for them—"an ill-favored thing, sir, but mine own."

It is a further happy circumstance that the topic "Integration Trends in the South" calls for the talents of the observer or the historian rather than those of the prophet. About May 17, 1954, the date of the decision, we were making predictions. These had to do with the strength of the opposition and the rate of speed. I hope none of you made book on our rosy estimates; if so, you took heavy losses. We sadly underestimated the opposition and overestimated the speed. So we have about gone out of the predicting business.

We were not wrong at all points. In common with the rest of the country, we felt that segregation would curl up at the edges; that the border States, having advantage of neighborly contact with integrated commonwealths, having relatively small Negro populations and no plantation background, would go first and easily. That prediction has stood up except in the case of Virginia which has thus far been held in line by the iron hand of the BYRD machine.

Since the May 17 decision there has been integration in degree ranging from the merely token to full and bonafide in the southern States of Arkansas, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas; the border States of West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, and Oklahoma and the District of Columbia. In terms of school districts the number integrated is some 800 out of a total of 2,890. And, in terms of Negro children in "integrated situations," as the phrase is, the number is 400,000 out of a total of 3 million. These figures, I am sure, are familiar to you but I like to recite them. They are evidences of solid progress and reassuring reminders that peaceful and statesmanlike procedures do not make headlines. "Happy the people whose annals are dull."

In passing, and in order to wring the last drop of comfort from the southern situation, let us salute Florida which last month admitted the first Negro student to its law school, and Louisiana, which in the same month first admitted 59 Negroes as undergraduates in a white State college. Perhaps we should more appropriately salute the Federal Court which directed these admissions. But at least Florida and Louisiana have bowed gracefully to the inevitable. Grace in race relations is so rare as to deserve applause.

Apart from the public schools in the hard core States, desegregation is making, if not satisfactory, at least substantial, progress.

It now appears, not only from what meets the eye, but from utterances of segregation leaders themselves, that, in practically all other areas except the public schools, segregation is withering with no impressive effort being made to keep it alive. Cities and States in most instances have taken lickings on golf courses, parks, transportation, and the like and have accepted the result. Of course, we hear of the golf course that is closed but a dozen others remain open to both races. There is nothing approaching massive resistance in those fringe areas of the segregation problem.

In their back-to-the-wall stand on integration of the public schools, the seven hard core States are now pursuing a new and significant strategy. The early effort of the segregationist leaders was to move and stir southern opinion to the point of open opposition to the law. That was a thoroughly ignoble but fairly easy task. More recently they have embarked upon a much more ambitious enterprise—and I think you who live out of the South should be quite aware of it. They now seek to subvert the public opinion of North, East, and West to the segregationist view. Of course, they don't call it that. They refer to it as education in States rights, limitation of judicial power, and other euphonious terms. But what they mean is the preservation of a caste system in the South. Under one name or another your aid—you nonsoutherners—your aid is now being actively sought. It's an old story—Confederates capturing Yankees.

The movement to convert you is well financed and well organized. Certain States have their propaganda bureaus financed by public funds as well as by antilabor money and reactionary subsidies. They pour out pamphlets by the hundreds of thousands. They sent speakers on foreign missions. They flatter and fawn upon northern papers or writers who abet their plan.

This effort should not be taken lightly. Already certain northern columnists, magazines, and newspapers follow the segregationist line. The effort to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court failed by one vote in the Senate. And, most unkindest cut of all, the chief justices of the State supreme courts gave that effort their implied support.

There is something quite persuasive in this new southern approach to the rest of the Nation. In the first place, the rest of the Nation hasn't perfectly solved its own integration problem. Our sense of generosity finds expression in the twin ideas "Who am I to tell you how to run your affairs?" and "I can appreciate fully what you are up against in the South." And, lamentably, there are many Americans in all sections of the country who are not democratic at heart. They listen with a sympathetic ear.

This invasion of the North—a kind of second march on Gettysburg—presents one of the anomolies of the times. This is the age of the sputnik. Each day the range of our interests is extended. Each day we become acutely aware of the interdependence of men upon each other. We become more conscious of involvement of our own destinies with the destinies of men in the world's remotest corners. There is daily borne in upon us the essential unity and indivisibility of mankind with the result that what affects one affects all.

In such a context, how like a voice from the Dark Ages is the white supremacist's whimpering plea that you in the North have no concern with what happens to your Negro brothers of the South; that you have no license to be heard; that your endeavor to influence the southern situation is impertinent meddling in a matter of only local interest and significance.

Certainly you will not fall for that argument. Only one far gone in schizophrenia can embrace at the same time a sense of international civic responsibility and the provincialism of the segregation philosophy.

You who share the world's revulsion at the Russian treatment of Boris Pasternak will hardly remain indifferent to the stern fate of hundreds of lesser Pasternaks in the South who think and write and teach and preach and speak at their peril.

There is, then, this trend, this effort to sell the segregation cause to the nonsoutherner. Beware of its soft seductions.

You may not know it, but you are being wooed by Senator EASTLAND and Senator THURMOND. We hope there shall be no betrothal, certainly no marriage, and, as to issue, God forbid.

There is another trend which might well undergo some examination. In this connection I use "trend" as an evolution from the simple to the complex.

Following the Supreme Court decision there came from certain Governors, Senators, Congressmen, and others highly placed, declarations that their States would not observe the law. One law. The law relating to integration of the public schools. A new phrase crept into our speech—"massive resistance"—and two old ideas were resurrected after 100 years of quiet repose—nullification and interposition. I wish to emphasize that the proponents of such views had in mind a purely limited objective: noncompliance with one single law, not public rebellion against all law. If we may liken their inflammatory utterances to a bomb, their pinpointed target was integration of the public schools.

They employed all of their cunning to develop methods of preserving a segregated system—private schools with State subsidy, tuition grants, pupil-assignment acts, local control, complicated legal steps to be taken by aggrieved parties, redistricting, and all the rest of a list of odorous maneuvers. One by one these devices come before the Court and are branded as the transparent frauds they are.

Such was the pinpointed objective and such were the methods of attaining it.

But, of course, basically, what they advocate is disrespect for law.

They choose to limit such advocacy to one law. But when you enter the area of disrespect there is no such thing as a limited infection. It spreads. What right have they to tell me what laws I shall observe? My right of choice is fully as good as theirs. They choose to flout school law. I may, with as much right, choose to flout the law which protects the life and property of the man who disagrees with me. They seek to get results by chicanery. Men less subtle and sophisticated may perforce get their results by violence.

The bomb is aimed at integration of the schools. But whither drifts the fallout? It drifts in part into the mind and heart of the ignorant, the unlettered, the evilly disposed. When cunning and sly maneuvers have had their day, when all legal tactics are exhausted, when what passes for intelligence has failed—what is the untutored citizen to do? Well, he has his fists, doesn't he? He has dynamite. He has torches. There rings in his ears the voice of authority telling him segregation must be preserved. So he uses the only tools he knows.

So we have proceeded inevitably from the rolling phrases of a Governor, through the subleties of legislation, to repression, cross-burning, assaults, bombings, and murder. Through all these evil and sometimes bloody acts there runs the dark thread of connection. The official policy of resistance to one law was the bomb. Foul and dastardly deeds are the inevitable fallout.

Then how crocodile are the tears of the seregationist public officials who weep at violence. Actually, there is blood on their hands.

These leaders are careful to point out that they do not condone violence. Concededly, there are points of difference between violence and legislative or official maneuvering, as there is between highway robbery and embezzelment. Force is used in robbery and not in embezzlement. The motive in both instances is identical—to deprive a person of his property. So, in the civil rights field, with violence or legal duplicity, the motive is identical—to deprive a person of a right.

I am not at all sure that the points of difference are favorable to the officials. Acts of violence may often be dismissed as the impulsive and unthinking conduct of brutish men. But your legislative maneuverers—your private school men, your State subsidy, tuition grants, pupil assignment, local control, gerrymandering men—have no such claim upon our consideration. They are trained and skilled and cunning men. They plot their schemes, mull over them, debate them for weeks on end. There is malice aforethought, always more to be condemned than the impulsive act.

Bad as it may be, what is done by the poor devil who burns a cross or plants a bomb is his individual act, in no sense committing or involving his State. But what is done by men in governor's mansions or legislative halls becomes State policy, carrying with it all the sanction and authority of a State. It seems almost blasphemous that men should use the sacred power of a State for such ignoble ends.

So the fallout from the bomb of resistance to one law has borne in its train resistance to any law one does not like. Carried to its logical conclusion, the end result would be anarchy.

It was considerations such as these which motivated the Supreme Court decision in the recent Little Rock case. That decision means that there is to be no surrender to mob action, no compromise in the national effort to give an equal chance to every American child. More importantly, it made a point which should not be lost on every rebellious State. That is, that the Court is not deceived by southern evasive maneuvers. The hard core States now know they cannot win by subterfuge and evasion.

There is a moral aspect to such procedures. The legal qualities upon which the resisting States have relied have been cunning, slickness, shrewdness. (We have just witnessed the "taming of the shrewd." Such have been the qualities magnified in the public mind and held up as ideals before young lawyers and politicians. We now know they are no substitutes for brains, intelligence, and character. The truly great lawyer or statesman is not slick; he is profound.

We may now return to our former conception of what are honorable courses for States to pursue.

Such is the meaning of the recent decision. Such is the handwriting upon the wall. Those who can't read it should go to school—an integrated school, of course.

You will be told by many that race relations in the South have become worse as a result of the 1954 decisions in the school segregation cases. Proponents of that view point to clashes which have occurred and say that, but for the decisions, this would not have happened.

For the sake of argument let us concede the facts. What do they imply? They imply that there was latent in some areas of the South racial ill-will amounting to hostility or even hatred. But it was unexpressed; it did not come to boiling point. It had no normal outlet. Hence, it perpetually simmered and smouldered. I am, of course, not an expert in the field, but I have a feeling that any good psychiatrist would tell us that such pent-up hatreds wreak great damage to personality. Relief comes from getting things off our chests. The last 4 years have been a period of catharsis, of cleansing and purging ourselves of this foul accumulation of fancied spites and grievances. We may in the future be less neurotic because for once and at long last we have spouted the venom we have harbored.

Whenever we make it possible for every man to air publicly a logical grievance we have contributed to community sanity.

Race relations seem worse because their ugly aspects have been revealed. They were just as ugly when unseen. Dirt under the rug is still dirt.

But let us return to trends. The all-embracive trend in the hard core States—the one of which all others are satellites—is the trend toward tyrany. In the use of that term I speak by the book.

The first badge of tyranny is that it establishes or maintains itself by suspension of legal or constitutional guaranties. It does so for the basic reason of self-preservation. It cannot exist where such guaranties are in full vigor. As William Pitt remarked, "Where law ends, tyranny begins." The tyrant or dictator wishes to impose his own will upon mankind but there stands the law, shining and undisuadable, between him and the citizen. So the law must first be struck down.

There might be infinite multiplication of instances of dictatorships created or maintained by suspension or revocation of rights guaranteed by constitutions. Illustrations leap out from every one of history's more unsavory and grisly chapters. Indeed, the generalization might be ventured that no dictatorship or tyranny is ever created except by first striking down the constitutional safeguards which surround the citizen. For the suppression of individual rights is of the essence of tyranny. It is impossible to imagine tyranny without suppression; conversely, it is impossible to imagine suppression without tyranny.

There is a second badge of tyranny. It is the hostility which tyranny feels for established and respected courts and judicial process. (We must keep in mind that tyranny may mark the conduct of an individual, a group or government itself.)

What stands between the tyrant and the citizen, as we have noted, is law, usually the Constitution. The instrument through which law or Constitution speaks is the Court. The law, conceived of as a real existence, dwelling apart and alone, speaks through the voice of the Court. The law impinges upon mankind, not more because it exists than because the Court has given it voice. The will of the dictator is thwarted, if at all, because of what the Court has declared the law to be. In its final analysis, the inevitable clash is not between two abstractions, dictatorship and law, but between dictatorship personified in an individual or group and law personified in the Court. Such was the recent conflict in Washington.

So, the character, composition, and powers of courts are matters of profound and unholy concern to dictators. An independent judiciary, able, learned, and incorruptible, is anathema to the dictator. To him the Court alone may say "Thus far and no farther shall you go." In his hot quest of power, in his trampling upon human rights, the sole agency to challenge the dictator's will is these interpreters of the law. So upon them war is declared.

Such, then, historically, are the methods of tyrants or demogogs. (The terms may be used interchangeably.) The formula is simple: By decree or legislative act strike down constitutional guarantees; and undermine confidence in courts to the point that their decrees have no public acceptance. Either alone would probably be effective. Taken together they inevitably insure the temporary success of tyranny, whether it be the tyranny of an individual, a clique or a majority. Under such a regime the rights of a minority are doomed.

What we have experienced in certain areas of the South in the past 4 years is nothing less than tyranny. There has been suspension of rights guaranteed by the Constitution. In many instances this has been affirmative action—constitutional amendment, statutory enactment, proclamations by Governors, resolutions by school boards, and the like. In other instances, there has been negative suspension—a failure to uphold or support constitutional rights. There is no difference in morals or practical effect. In either case rights have been lost or destroyed. One struck by lightning is only academically interested in whether the bolt was positive or negative electricity.

If the shades of Joseph Stalin, or Benito Mussolini, or Adolph Hitler, could crawl up to the edge of the pit and survey the southern scene, they would confer their benediction upon much of what there transpires.

The books must now be purged and cleansed of all legal perversions written into them by bigotry. This is primarily the job of us in the South. The school laws, teacher's oaths, laws requiring that the NAACP bare its membership, antibarratry laws aimed at the NAACP, laws setting up so-called antisubversion committees—the whole breed of repressive statutes—by last count 169—must be erased. That is largely a southern job. And there are southerners willing to undertake it.

In view of the former apathy of the administration and the solid phalanx presented by governments of the resisting States, it is remarkable that liberal voices should now be heard anywhere in the South. On the contrary, they are at this moment louder and clearer than ever. Integrationists are now more militant than ever. This is no mere rhetoric on a fall day. I give you the specifics.

In the first few weeks following the May 17, 1954, decision, journals of certain southern university law schools carried scholarly articles by professors analyzing the proposed evasive schemes and condemning them all upon constitutional grounds. Their authors—men like Francis B. Nicholson, of South Carolina; Warren E. Guerke, of Emory; and Jay Murphy, of Alabama—exhibited not only scholarship but courage. They stood alone—eggheads.

But observe the effect of a good example. In Little Rock a few days ago 61 lawyers of that city signed a statement condemning as unconstitutional Governor Faubus' private school plan. Those men were not eggheads. They were run of the mine laywers and they uttered the ancient and honored principles of the law.

Also, in those calm and reflective days of 1954, a few church bodies—synods, dioceses, conventions and the like—adopted supporting resolutions. They disturbed no one. They were far away and remote. They could do no harm. Let those men at the top resolve. But, observe. In Arkansas and Virginia and elsewhere in the South within recent weeks ministers of all faiths, pastors of small churches in the very eye of the storm, have confronted Governors and Senators and denounced their wicked schemes. They uttered the ancient and honored principles of religion.

So your parent-teacher associations of not too long ago might have been thought of as well-meaning and innocuous. But when the closing of public schools became a fact or imminent, the gentle folk who composed the associations were not overawed or daunted by the entrenched power of a State. They challenged the prevailing lunacy.

I might go on. Concerned taxpayers. Public schoolchildren themselves—you have seen them on TV. Public opinion in favor of compliance with law is more militant today than at any time since the original decision. From being the view of a handful of so-called do-gooders, advocacy of integration is now a grassroots phenomenon.

We may thank Governor Faubus and Governor Almond for that. So long as the fate of public education was a matter of idle speculation, those actually or potentially liberal were disposed to remain inactive, uncommited. But when it became evident that the two States stood upon the very brink—to use a term from Mr. Dulles—when it appeared that the alternatives were to do complete justice on the one hand or to destroy public schools on the other, the silent became vocal, the hesitant became bold.

There is also a national job and I appeal to you in NAIRO as being the one group preeminently qualified by training, experience and motivation to prod the national conscience and rouse the great giant which is America from its lethargy. Certainly, the demands of the moment cannot be met merely by a court. That is employing only one third of the national power and energy. The executive branch has its role. Congress has its role. For all three arms of the Government there is good fighting all along the line.

Consider with me for a moment the situation in stark and unvarnished terms, stripped of all its tawdry pretensions. The Supreme Court has held that racial segregation in public education is unconstitutional. But 4 years after the event it exists in seven Southern States which declare they will not obey the law. That is rebellion without the dignity of formal secession.

Certain school districts wish to comply with law. They are told in some instances if you do, State funds will be cut off, and in others, we will close your doors. That is blackmail by State action. No idle threat either, as Governor Faubus and Governor Almond have proven.

Presented with a choice between ignorance and honor, they have chosen ignorance.

Negro children seek to exercise a constitutional right. They turn to the one great organization qualified to help. That organization is beset with a series of State actions designed to cripple it or to force its suspension. That is sabotage of an honorable agency whose sole mission is to secure judicial determination of legal rights.

So, if we were morbid enough, we could run the entire gamut of repression.

Certainly, such activities are not matters of merely local concern. I say to you from North, East, and West that your own welfare, your own destiny hangs in the balance. The bright image of America as a land of equal opportunity, of concern for the rights of the individual, of the open door to merit and worth—that image is being marred and defaced. I know of no more serious indictment of a nation than that it permitted school doors to be slammed in the face of an aspiring child.

At the last session of the Congress Senator DOUGLAS and associates introduced a bill which, if enacted, would have marshaled Government's united power in aid of the liberal elements of the South. I have time only to point out that, among other features, it provided Federal funds for school districts whose State aid was cut off because of their compliance with law. What a different situation we might have in Arkansas and Virginia if such were the law.

While, admittedly, law will not solve everything, the Douglas, or some similar bill, must be enacted. A lone Negro child, seeking a right under the Constitution, a qualified person seeking to register to vote, a skilled and qualified workman seeking a job—these must not be left to pit their puny strength against the massed power of a State. The Federal Government should not be a callous spectator of such unequal conflicts.

Just a word as to what you beyond the South may do to aid the cause.

First, and negatively, don't succumb to the argument that you are outsiders meddling in other people's affairs. We must never overlook the dual nature of citizenship in this country. The Negro children knocking upon school doors may be citizens of South Carolina or Louisiana. They are no less citizens of the United States of America. It is rights under the American Constitution they seek to assert. They do so as your fellow citizens. In that view, your concern is fully as acute as the concern of a native-born white citizen of South Carolina or Louisiana.

Keep always in mind that what is happening in certain areas of the South is a suspension of guaranties of the American Constitution. That suspension is as real as if proclaimed by a formal edict of a dictator. Such a suspension, whether formally proclaimed or not, is an act of tyranny. No American citizen has the right to acquiesce in tyranny.

All rights guaranteed by the Constitution are of equal sanctity. The right of school attendance is as sacred as freedom of the press. There is no moral difference between closing school doors and closing printing presses. One will lead to the other.

Finally, the white southern liberal is acutely vulnerable. He bucks the truly formidable power of his State; quite often he bucks community, friends, family. He is apt to be lonely. Don't wash your hands of him. Let him at all times be sustained by the consciousness that, in those areas of his land where men are not so stirred by the passions of the moment, there are understanding and sympathy.

[From the Denver Post, Aug. 31, 1958]

THE 90-YEAR DELAY ON CIVIL RIGHTS

As the time for the opening of a new school term nears, the entire country feels a sense of foreboding over racial disputes which seems to be moving inevitably toward a new climax of hatred—and perhaps violence—in Arkansas and Virginia.

These are troubled times for parents and children—both black and white—in States which have clung to school segregation. They are troubled times for school officials, for legislators and Governors, for Federal officials, for the President of the United States and for Federal judges, most of all, for the Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Before the Supreme Court, the school board of Little Rock is pleading for permission to delay for 2½ years the further desegregation of its Central High School. This plea is made 4 years after the Court first held school segregation to be unconstitutional.

The President has expressed himself as being in favor of slower integration. Thus, he deprives the Court of his moral backing in the event the Court decides that no additional delay can be given without compromising an important constitutional principle.

He puts the administration in an equivocal position at a time when clear, understandable policy is desirable. Although insisting that court orders must be obeyed, Mr. Eisenhower has declined to say whether he believes segregation is right or wrong.

This puts him at odds with the Department of Justice which took a leading part in 1954 in urging the Supreme Court to abolish segregation on moral as well as strictly legal grounds. Also, the President's refusal to comment on the rightness or wrongness of segregation is in marked contrast to the speech which his Attorney General, William P. Rogers, made last week before the American Bar Association.

"For a nation which stands for full equality under the law," Mr. Rogers said, "which solemnly believes that all men are equal before the law, regardless of race, religion, or place of national origin, the result (of the Supreme Court's desegregation opinion) undoubtedly is permanent."

He added that this country could not "fall short of the mark" on race relations if it is to maintain influence abroad.

The apparent schizophrenia in the administration on the race issue does not make the task of the Supreme Court any easier.

But whether integration should be fast or slow is not the real issue, of course. The plea for delay is raised on behalf of those who oppose integration no matter when it might come. They are interested in delay only because it would give them more time to try to turn the tide of events which is running against them.

Delay? We now face this month of fateful decision because for 90 years the country has delayed, temporized and postponed the necessity of finally coming to grips with the question of whether, in a free land, citizens with one color of skin can be told they may not enter public buildings, public parks, or other public places where citizens of another color are permitted full liberty of access.

The 14th amendment to the Constitution was adopted in 1868. It says, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This, of course, was one of the reconstruction amendments which followed the Civil War. It was a departure from the past. In the Dred Scott case, before the war, the Supreme Court had held that Negroes could not be citizens. It was a departure, also, in that it told the States they could not do certain things.

The Federal Government was the creation of the States. Here the child was beginning to boss the parents. The 14th amendment implied a reversal in status. Because national considerations required it, the National Government had suddenly become paramount in certain new areas of the law.

This implication the extreme segregationists of the South still deny. In his harangues last week, Governor Faubus of Arkansas argued that the conduct of schools is a State matter and that the Federal Government, which has no powers except those derived from the States, may not interfere.

After the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court, year after year, in a wide variety of cases involving police actions, commerce, taxes, labor, banking, public utilities, etc., found it necessary to define and redefine exactly what privileges of citizens the States could not abridge.

Its decisions were not always consistent but the list of privileges grew gradually. At times the Court tried to rationalize the theory that the States could treat Negro citizens differently than white citizens but a nagging suspicion always remained that the Fourteenth Amendment could not logically be stretched to justify that kind of discrimination.

Forty-one years ago, the Court first held that an ordinance to keep whites and Negroes from living in the same neighborhood was invalid. That was a straw in the wind. After that it could only be a matter of time until the Court would find that the enforced separation of races in railroad cars, parks, schools and other public places was not consistent with the concept of one and equal citizenship for all.

The present Supreme Court, for all the venom poured upon it, has done nothing more than follow the decisions of earlier Courts to their logical and inescapable conclusions.

Has desegregation come too hurriedly? Should there be further delay? Would a postponement make integration any more acceptable to the South? These are questions the Supreme Court must now answer in a supercharged and apprehensive atmosphere.

In the light of the long evolution of the idea that citizenship must mean the same thing for all citizens, there can be little doubt as to what the decision must be.

INTEGRATION MUST MOVE

(By Roy Wilkins)

(Executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Roy Wilkins, who graduated from the University of Minnesota, was for 15 years editor of the Crisis and prior to that, from 1923 to 1931, managing editor of the Call, the Negro weekly of Kansas City. In this article he carries forth the discussion initiated by Agnes Meyer in her January article, Race and the Schools.)

A good deal of nonsense has been written and spoken upon the public school desegregation question. With some notable exceptions we have exhibited little honesty, ingenuity, commonsense, and courage in approaching it. The Atlantic recognized the significance of the problem by featuring the sincere article, Race and the Schools, by Agnes E. Meyer in its January issue. Yet Mrs. Meyer, for all her knowledge of and devotion to the public school system and her sincerity as an American liberal, has repeated some of the interpretations that have placed the situation on dead center and kept it there.

Hardly anyone sits down to a typewriter on this question without cautioning the Negro to abjure haste. William Faulkner used the columns of a multi-million-circulation weekly magazine to shout "Go slow" to the NAACP. As the final caution Mrs. Meyer in the January Atlantic counsels, "Make haste slowly."

Those who read and run might gather from all this that Negroes had been knocking down school doors, browbeating administrators and boards of education, or throwing picket lines around the schools from which they are barred. Nothing could be further from the truth. The majority of Negroes are mild and forbearing, much to the irritation of a growing number among them who wish for a program of more action.

There has been no pell-mell rush toward desegregation, no demand for instantaneous change. Certainly the NAACP has not advocated overnight alteration of school patterns. However, both the NAACP and Negro citizens generally have insisted that school boards come to grips with the question and that beginnings in good faith be made. Five days after the 1954 decision of the Supreme Court, Dr. Channing H. Tobias, NAACP board chairman, set the tone for the organization's procedure in a message to its southern leaders meeting in Atlanta:

"It is important that calm reasonableness prevail, that the difficulties of adjustment be realized, and that, without any sacrifice of basic principles, the spirit of give-and-take characterize the discussions. Let it not be said of us that we took advantage of a sweeping victory to drive hard bargains or impose unnecessary hardships upon those responsible for working out the details of adjustment."

Here was the calm deliberation which since then has been urged so insistently upon Negro citizens. Here was consideration for school administrators and others upon whom would fall the burden of planning desegregation. But here, also, was quiet determination upon basic principles, upon change in the old order, upon access to light and opportunity after 57 years in the semidarkness of the separate-but-never-equal doctrine.

It is this determination that the opponents of the Negro's aspiration are trying to break with their repeated cries of "Slow down." They are shadowboxing over speed; the real target is any change at all.

The handwriting regarding segregated schools was on the wall as early as 1935, when Donald Gaines Murray won his way, via the Maryland Supreme Court, into the Law School of the University of Maryland. The picture became clearer through U.S. Supreme Court decisions in 1938, 1948, and 1950, together with other Federal court decisions in this period forbidding a racial differential in teachers' salaries.

With the principle unmistakably stated in the University of Texas case in 1950, it was only a matter of time before a challenge on the elementary and secondary levels would be before the courts. No Governor, or attorney general, or State board of education, or mayor, or local school board, or responsible school administrator can claim today that the 1954 decision on public schools was sudden. All of them had had a maximum notice of 19 years and a minimum one of 4 years (from the Texas case). That they understood what was foreshadowed is demonstrated by the frantic building programs for Negro schools into which the Southern States plunged from 1949 to 1954 in a desperate effort to stave off the inevitable.

No, the Negro is not pushing too fast; he spent nearly two decades making his moves in a slow, orderly manner through the courts. Today he is proceeding with moderation and behaving with dignity under an intense fire of falsehood, intimidation, and persecution. Politically shackled and economically harassed, he has endured the persecution of State governments in which he has no voice and the ruthlessness of power structures in which he has no influence.

While he does not rant, he remains determined. A Gallup poll last December revealed that 69 percent of southern Negroes want the Supreme Court decision enforced, as against 53 percent nearly 2 years before. Only 13 percent were recorded as opposed. A survey published in the Catholic Digest in August 1957 showed that 93 percent of the southern Negroes supported the policies of the NAACP.

All this would indicate that the Negro American is neither wild-eyed and obstreperous nor divided on this issue. He believes that the way to begin is to begin. He cannot be expected to cheer a beginning such as that in Winston-Salem, N.C., where 1 Negro child has been integrated in the entire city system, nor that in Little Rock, where 9 Negroes are distributed among 1,991 whites in Central High School. If he greets these and similar efforts with something less than enthusiasm, it does not mean that he wants to go too fast; it means merely that he does not want to stand still.

Another favorite myth is that the Negro by insisting on some movement in good faith toward desegregation is seeking to destroy the public school system and the standards of public education. Governor Luther Hodges of North Carolina used this as a theme in a statewide radio and television talk in 1956.

The only people who have threatened to destroy the public schools in certain States are white people, mostly politicians in high and low offices. The Negro wants more and better schools, not fewer.

Nor does the Negro seek to lower educational standards. Who knows better than he on how great a scale his children have been cheated of a decent education over all these years? He knows that a frightening number of them are lagging behind whites at certain levels. But he does not follow the "logic" which says that the way to cure this condition is to maintain the segregation which produced it.

Allowing for the 350,000 Negro children who have been integrated since 1954, there are still slightly more than 2 million Negroes remaining in segregated schools. Some commentators seek comfort by concentrating on the 350,000, but most Negroes and fairminded whites, while welcoming this beginning, keep their sights on the presently immobile 2 million. Negroes know that not all these 2 million children are below par, that some of them can equal or surpass their grade levels in any test. They know, too, that still more could pass easily if given brief, intensive, and sympathetic remedial attention.

Assuming that a mere 10 percent of the 2 million could pass their tests tomorrow, would their integration "ruin" public education standards? Obviously not, and the the integration total would jump more than 50 percent. If those who can quickly be brought to standard were added, the total would be still more satisfying—and no white child would be retarded thereby.

And, speaking of retardation, what of the present plight of average and superior children now attending all-white schools in company with a not negligible number of children who are below average, even poor? Recent figures from a Texas city purport to show that 59 percent of whites in the fourth grade were at or above their grade level as compared with only 13.5 percent of Negroes. But, aside from the contrast with Negroes, this survey reveals that more than 40 percent of the white children are below average. Excluding a few experts, is anyone complaining that the presence of this two-fifths is ruining the education of the three-fifths?

If this argument is valid with respect to Negroes, it is valid with respect to the substantial number of substandard white children. It becomes, therefore, a problem of education rather than one of race.

As the Negro views the present situation, there would seem to be certain requisites to a beginning toward reducing tensions and getting on with desegregation. The segregation problem is not the same in the North as it is in the South. The difference is apparent to even a casual observer of trolleys, buses, city halls, State legislatures, parks, theaters, restaurants, hotels, factories, and white-collar employment. As for schools, despite de facto segregation there are Negro teachers and students in mixed situations, with Negro honor students, class presidents, and athletes. In New York City the desegregation principle has been recognized, the Supreme Court respected, proposals drawn up, and debate encouraged. There is movement. The same cannot be said for Richmond, Savannah, Jacksonville, Mobile, Shreveport, or Hattiesburg.

Further, the segregationists must face, sooner or later, the fact that the soothing doubletalk handed to Aunt Mandy and Uncle Jim falls on the deaf and scornful ears of today's Tom, Dick, and Harry. These latter have traveled far from the home county; tens of thousands have been off to war and seen far places; thousands more have gone to school under the GI bill; they have radios and television sets; they read newspapers, magazines, and books. That is why the Montgomery bus protest lasted 1 year instead of 5 days as predicted by local whites who "knew" their Negroes. That is why the time-tested formula of dividing the "good" Negroes from the "radical" ones has failed on the school desegregation issue.

Next, there should be, among those genuinely desirous of getting something done, an end to the characterization of court action and political pressure as "force." The perversion reduces legal action in accordance with a decree of the Nation's Highest Court to the same level as mob action stirred by a John Kasper. The same reasoning lumps together as extremists the NAACP, which supports the Supreme Court, and the White Citizens Councils, organized specifically to defy the Court. Inveighing against the employment of political action by Negro citizens is asking them to forego an instrument which is the very backbone of a democratic society, one that is used for everything from cutting a curbstone to, say, fixing the rate for interstate natural gas. They cannot be expected to acquiesce.

Equally pointless are the running references to the era of good feeling that is alleged to have existed in the years prior to the 1954 decision of the Court. It is true that southern whites experienced few racial tensions, for they found that a segregated society, rigidly controlled through political disfranchisement, economic ceilings, and social customs, was comfortable and relaxing. But for the Negro it was an era of frustration.

While we were making the world safe for democracy in one war and destroying Hitler's master race theory in another, the Negro rode in the back of the bus, lived in a ghetto across the railroad tracks, sent his children to Jim Crow schools, worked at restricted jobs, enjoyed either inferior or no public recreation, endured daily humiliation and insult, received uneven justice in the courts, and was the victim of violence. He is not overcome with nostalgia for the pre-1954 days; he has bid them a grim and tearless goodby.

The Negro wants to be a partner in this great social change. He has offered his cooperation from the very beginning, but his peaceful petitions offering aid in drawing up desegregation plans were rejected, filed away, or turned over to local segregationists so that the signers could be fired from their jobs. The Negro is still deeply interested in building better schools for all children. He believes segregated schools have hurt white children as he knows full well they have hurt his. But partnership implies mutual respect and consultation, leading to cooperative movement. Where these necessary conditions have been met, he has been a willing collaborator.

If Mrs. Meyer's admonition, "The chief responsibility for leadership is still that of the white population," is to be meaningful in the light of present-day urgencies, there must be the sharing of responsibility for plans and results which is inherent in the partnership concept.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. First I wish to compliment the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois on his splendid statement, not only relating to the several sections of the bill which he has introduced today, in cooperation with others of us who have joined him as cosponsors——

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Minnesota is the first cosponsor. Like Abou Ben Adhem, his name leads all the rest.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am delighted to be the Senator's partner in this endeavor and effort. However, I wish to add that his address also gets to the very heart and core of the problem of civil liberties and civil rights in our country and the Federal means in protecting those rights as embodied in the 14th amendment to the Constitution. I am afraid that sometimes we fail to remember that citizenship in the United States is a dual citizenship. We are citizens of a State, and we also have a superior citizenship as citizens of the United States of America. The effort being made in the proposal is to protect the citizenship rights of the citizenship of the United States of America.

As the Senator from Illinois has said, the 14th amendment, which is an integral part of the Constitution of the United States, is a part of the Constitution which all public officials have taken an oath to uphold and to support and to defend and to enforce.

I hope that those who comment on this measure will study the sections of the bill very carefully. It seems to me that there is a great deal of importance attached to the sequence of the titles of the bill. First of all, there is stated the interest of the Federal Government in the protection of certain constitutional rights. In other words, it is a declaration of the Federal responsibility for Congress to declare its intention to safeguard and guarantee to all Americans the constitutional right to equal protection of the laws regardless of race, color, religion, or national origin; and that the decisions of the Supreme Court shall be protected by all due and reasonable means.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is an affirmative statement on the part of Congress in support of the supreme law of the land.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is completely correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish that, as discussion on this measure takes place—and there will be a discussion in which there will be a great deal of differences and, I am sure, heated differences—that those who are the critics of the proposed legislation will keep in mind that the purpose of the bill is first and initially to place Congress foursquare on the side of the equal-protection-of-laws provisions of the Constitution of the United States and in support of the supreme law of the land as interpreted by the Supreme Court.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Minnesota is making a very significant point. I have always thought that it was not in the power of an individual or of a State to say, "We will accept certain sections of the Constitution, but we will reject others. We will accept the 10th amendment to the Constitution, but we will not accept the 14th amendment," which became a part of the Constitution almost 80 years afterward. A selective observance of the law, of course, would soon lead to anarchy.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Of course statehood itself encompasses full acceptance of all the provisions of the Constitution. I would also caution those who study the provisions of the bill to note that the means which are prescribed and described in the bill are reasonable legal means, and that there is no effort to deny to others, who may have a different point of view, the use of their legal means for the protection of their point of view.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. If the Senator from Minnesota will look at title II of the bill, he will see that emphasis is placed on technical assistance, distribution of information, cooperative action between the Federal Government and the localities, persuasion, advisory councils and the work of technical specialists in race relations.

Therefore, every effort is made to create a peaceful climate of opinion and to move forward in harmony.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I may say to the Senator that, had that effort been made at the time of the famous Supreme Court decision in the Brown case, and had the Chief Executive of this land and the executive branch of the Government utilized the tremendous influence and prestige of the office to facilitate community compliance and law observance along some of the lines suggested by title II—much of which could have been accomplished by the exertion of executive leadership—I do not believe we would be in the present impasse.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I agree with the Senator, but at the same time I wish to say that I do not believe we can blame the executive only. I believe that Congress also has failed in its duty.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe that is true. We are attempting to remedy that situation at this time. However, once the Supreme Court has laid down its decision, the responsibility for the enforcement is in the executive branch of the Government. No one can avoid it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It may be that in practice the executive—in slang parlance—can get away with not enforcing a decision of the Supreme Court, as Andrew Jackson once said in connection with a decision of the Supreme Court, when he made the remark, "Let John Marshall enforce his own decision"; however, the normal procedure is for the executive agency to try to carry out, by executive action, the decisions of the Supreme Court. At the same time I do not want to absolve ourselves from responsibility.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The very fact that we have introduced this bill indicates our own responsibility, and I hope it will be fulfilled.

Title 3 is directed toward one of the complaints or one of the excuses which is frequently offered with respect to the failure to comply with Supreme Court decisions, namely, the lack of facilities or the lack of adequate equipment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or the extra cost.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Or the extra cost involved. I believe that is, in some instances, a genuine limitation. Therefore the bill we support today would provide funds to local communities which comply with the Court's decision but who are first with limitations such as the lack of adequate facilities or equipment to provide an integrated school program.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, it would authorize grants for more teachers, teacher training, school facilities, replacement of withdrawn State funds and so forth. It is very similar in principle to the Federal aid to schools in the so-called federally impacted areas, which the Senator from Minnesota was successful in getting Congress to adopt a good many years ago.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It was the first Federal-aid school construction program that we enacted. It was based on this same principle.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Minnesota is very modest, but the program was initiated by him and carried out by Congress in a bill which he introduced and sponsored.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. Title 4 provides that when other methods have failed—and this is not a matter now of preempting a field by the Federal Government—the executive branch of the Government, acting through the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, shall assume responsibility for insuring and developing desegregation plans to accomplish the objectives of the Court's decision.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true. And in order to make clear the reasonableness of the approach in this title, I think the attention of the Senate should be called to the language in the last five lines of section 402 of the bill, which I shall read:

> Tentative plans prepared by the Secretary under the authority of this section shall take into account the need of the particular area for time to make an orderly adjustment and transition from segregated to desegregated schools.

In other words, we are not proposing that a universal change be made overnight in every place.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is exactly true.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We want to provide adequate time for any change to be made. We recognize that the rate of progress cannot be the same in all localities and in all States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am greatly pleased that the Senator from Illinois has again underscored that particular provision. The only reason why I join in the colloquy now is not to add anything in particular to what the Senator from Illinois has already said, because he has said it with clarity and with purpose. I merely wish to make it absolutely clear that the provisions of the bill are not like having a shotgun at one's head. The provisions of the bill are to encourage cooperation, to facilitate cooperation, to seek the ordinary methods of cooperation at the local level, and to ask the Federal Government to take some initiative in doing all this, but to do so only in the light of local conditions and in cooperation with local officials, taking into account the time factor, as the Senator from Illinois has said, as it pertains to some very difficult adjustments which are necessary in a program such as this.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Section 402 also requires the consultation of local officials and citizens, and section 403 permits local authorities, private organizations, and private citizens to participate in hearings on the tentative plan, if it has not been accepted, and to present evidence and to argue either in favor of or in opposition to proposals for changes in the plan.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Essentially, the bill gives a little support to the thousands and thousands of people who, while they may not wish to initiate action in terms of compliance with the Supreme Court decision, are unwilling to engage in massive resistance. In other words, the purpose of the bill, as I see it, is to encourage those forces in the areas of the United States where the problem of school segregation and desegregation is so vital that they would like to be law abiding and law observing, and will cooperate even though it may be, at times, disagreeable to them and may cause them doubt as to whether they should proceed.

I think we should recognize that there is a tremendous number of people—and I hope it is the vast majority—who feel that if they are given some help, if there will be some standard raised around which they can rally, they will comply.

We are attempting to raise the standard, and to do so in a friendly, cooperative, helpful manner, rather than through some arbitrary edict.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If we may take, for example, the neighboring State of Virginia, the State which gave to the country Washington, Jefferson, George Mason, Madison, Monroe, John Marshall, Patrick Henry, and a whole series of other great defenders of liberty, there are at least three communities—Norfolk, Charlottesville, and Arlington—where there is a considerable body of opinion which favors obeying Federal law and Federal decisions. Hitherto, it has not been possible for the Federal Government to help them in a conciliatory fashion. They have been left to struggle alone in a very difficult situation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The particular provision to which the Senator from Illinois has referred would assist those people in fulfilling what they believe, in a patriotic manner, is their duty to perform.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yesterday it was Little Rock; today it is Norfolk and Charlottesville and Arlington; in a few months it may be Atlanta, and then New Orleans.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The purpose of the bill is to try to encourage proper, methodical compliance with the law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe we ought to continue to underscore the fact that what we are attempting to do is not to force, not to browbeat, not to use Federal edicts, but to extend the cooperating hand of the Federal Government, where local cooperation is no longer successful, and at the same time to authorize the chief law enforcement officer of the United States, the Attorney General, to take such action as the bill prescribes, to make certain that the supreme law of the land is not defied, and to see to it that obstructions which tend to prevent compliance with the law are not permitted to be effective.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true; but even that is to be, in a sense, the last resort.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is. That is why I said the titles should be considered. The titles which provide for legal actions are the very last titles in the bill.

The whole substance of the bill is, first, to put Congress on record as supporting the equal-protection-of-the-laws concept, as well as the decision of the Supreme Court; second, to offer the assistance of the Federal Government in terms of the utmost of local community cooperation; third, to offer the assistance of the Federal Government if and when local cooperation has been unsuccessful, including the assistance of the Federal Government in terms of funds, facilities, and equipment.

The only time resort would be had to the use of the injunctive powers or lawsuits through the courts on the part of the Attorney General would be when everything else had failed.

So the substance of the bill is law observance, not necessarily law enforcement. The only law enforcement is the final act if such observance is not made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator's understanding is completely correct.

In conclusion, I call attention to lines 3 to 9 on page 20 of the bill, in section 601(b). This and the preceding section provide that the Attorney General may only institute injunction suits under section 601 on a signed complaint and when the complaining persons or groups of persons are financially unable to bear the expense of the litigation, but also when there is reason to believe that the institution of such litigation would jeopardize the employment or other economic activity of, or might result in physical harm or economic damage to, such person or group of persons or their families.

In other words, if a man is able to conduct a suit in behalf of desegregation for his children, the Attorney General will not file the suit. It is only if the person is financially unable to do so, or if he may be threatened with bodily damage or loss of employment if he does so, that the Attorney General will initiate the case.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Illinois for his superb speech and for the very great merit of the measure he has introduced.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO FILE REPORTS DURING ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration be permitted to file reports during the adjournment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, during the winter of 1957–58, a group of dedicated men and women—leaders in the Nation's conservation movement—came to me to discuss the enormous and growing gap between our projected needs in forest and farmland productivity, and the programs of the State and Federal Governments in the field of natural-resource conservation. This gap demands the attention of every thoughtful American.

We are rightly and deeply concerned about the missile gap which today yawns between our national effort in the field of missile and rocket development and the corresponding Soviet effort. But there are other gaps, as well, which must concern our people. One is the resource-conservation gap—the broad gulf between our anticipated needs for food and fiber and forest products, beginning at the end of the next decade, and the predicatable productivity of our farms and woodlands.

Today, there is much official concern about agricultural surpluses—despite the fact that more than one-third of the world still goes hungry, and a population explosion is taking place throughout the world.

Mr. President, how shortsighted can we be?

There is much official talk about balancing the books of the Government, but little thought is given to balancing the necessary programs of Government.

There is much talk about spending—as though every expenditure of a Government dollar were a dollar down the drain; but there is little recognition that there are certain kinds of expenditures which, as every corporation knows, must be made as investments in order to increase productivity and gross income.

Mr. President, it is high time that the leadership of this Nation began to discuss the Federal budget in other terms than a simple comparison of dollars incoming and dollars outgoing each year. It is time that we began to look to the future; it is time to set some national goals, and to begin to discuss the positive steps of investing in constructive programs.

We should be thinking, for example, in terms of heavy investments in education, in research, and in the expansion of the productivity of our great natural resources, rather than forever groaning about spending in these areas.

I digress to point out that expenditures for national defense are also in the nature of an investment—as certainly as the expenditures which a corporation or the head of a family makes in taking out insurance as a hedge against disaster.

Mr. President, it might be very well if our Federal budget were divided on the basis of what we call capital outlays for investment purposes and expenditure outlays for current costs of operating Federal establishments. I believe it once was said that if the telephone company had budgeted for its operations in the way the Federal Government does, there never would have been an extra telephone, because, after all, when a private corporation invests money in capital goods, it considers that investment to be an asset, rather than a liability, and it has a way of being able to capitalize such expenditures or investments over a long period of time. The only budget I know of that is completely out of step with the reality of a capitalistic society in terms of capital investments and their relationships to productivity and wealth is the Federal Government's budget, because in no way does it have any connection at all to what we call investments in long-term assets, investments in income-producing projects. Instead, it deals with all such matters as if they were expenditures wasted each and every day.

Mr. President, we should also be thinking in terms of the necessary investment to at least make a start toward the solution of the bitter problem of juvenile delinquency—which, beyond its personal tragedy, is laying the groundwork for huge future national expenditures in the field of law enforcement, criminal-court proceedings, and imprisonment.

Mr. President, my friend, James Bennett, of the Bureau of Prisons, is nearly at his wit's end about what to do with the mushrooming prison population of this land of ours. Our reformatories are spilling over; our State and Federal prisons are packed and crowded beyond belief. And if we do not act quickly to provide for the most urgent needs of our prison administrators, I say frankly that

I do not know what they are going to do. I respectfully suggest that it might be a good idea for the appropriate committees of Congress to give this problem—including that of the maintenance of our reformatory and penal facilities—more thoughtful and more friendly consideration.

Yet if we were simply to deal with this problem on a year-to-year basis, and if we were to agree to provide Mr. Bennett with the new beds and cells he needs for next year, how shortsighted that would be.

What we must worry about are the prisons of 10 years and 20 years from now and the enormous expenditures of funds that our children are going to have to make in order to take care of the problems we are now creating—or permitting to happen—simply by inaction and lack of foresight.

Yes, Mr. President; there is another gap to worry about. We could call it the "youth conservation gap"; and it is represented by the gulf between what we are doing to prevent juvenile delinquency and what we ought to be doing to encourage the development of many hundreds of thousands of salvageable boys and girls into useful and happy adult citizens.

Three years ago, several of us advanced the proposition that we should make scholarships and low-interest loans available to gifted young people who do not have the financial wherewithal to go on to college training, to develop their natural gifts, not only for their own benefit, but for the Nation's.

Nothing much happened at first; but gradually the idea began to be discussed and debated. People began to get interested. Finally, with the magnificant leadership of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], last year a legislative program of great historic significance—the National Defense Education Act—was written.

We did not get all we wanted—but we are going to keep on working, because the resources represented by the talented young minds of America are precious indeed, and worth a very considerable national investment to insure that they are adequately trained and developed.

Similarly, there are many hundreds of thousands of young people who represent potential strength and productivity to the Nation, but whose abilities or inclinations do not indicate a professional career.

These are the young people who are apt to be forgotten in the preoccupation with professional training and, of course, there is a very evident lag in the development of sufficient scientists, teachers, and engineers. Many of these young people drift into the labor market with little training, often without completing high school.

Not only are they not going on to college—they are not going anywhere, some of them, except into boredom, confusion, and trouble.

Why should we permit this to happen? Why should we, through continued indifference, be responsible for the misery and tragedy of hundreds of thousands of wasted lives?

We cannot solve every problem through Federal action. That is self-evident. And the task of preventing juvenile delinquency is so complex and difficult that it would be foolish to claim that any one proposal could solve the problem. But the fact that a problem is complex should not prevent us from advancing partial solutions.

It was in the earnest hope that we could learn from the great lesson of the Civilian Conservation Corps that a number of us last year proposed the creation of a Youth Conservation Corps of 150,000 young men as a partial answer to the twin problems of natural resource conservation and youth conservation.

Putting together land and trees and water and boys is putting together a mighty good combination. As I address the present Presiding Officer from the State of Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], let me say it is a good combination, particularly in the Far West, where the land, the water, the trees, and the young men seem to work hand in hand.

Mr. President, I have summarized, in an article appearing in the current issue of Harper's magazine, the principal resource conservation projects which such a youth conservation corps could undertake, and I have suggested the ways in which such an organization could participate in a broad national program aimed at preventing juvenile delinquency and encouraging healthy maturity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks an article entitled "Trees, Land, and Boys," appearing in Harper's January 1959 issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, since our first proposal for a Youth Conservation Corps I have received many hundreds of thoughtful and specific communications from a number of groups—from conservationists, from juvenile court authorities, and from social welfare workers. There is wide agreement on the objectives and the need for legislation, and I wish to share with my colleagues just a few of the remarks which demonstrate the interest and enthusiasm throughout the Nation.

For example, Mr. A. W. Greeley, then regional forester for the Forest Service at Milwaukee, and now the Deputy Chief of the Forest Service, wrote me last year that—

> There is even more natural resource work to do today than there was when the CCC program came into being in 1933.

From the chief of police of North Chicago, Jacob J. Novak, comes this recollection of the value of the early CCC in steering boys on the right track:

> I have been chief of police here for 24 years, and during the early years of my career we saved many an errant boy by permitting him to go to the C's.

The director of a child guidance clinic in California has written to me as follows:

> My heart leapt as I saw the title of your article in the latest Harper's magazine, "A Plan To Save Trees, Land, and Boys." * * * This conception is at the very heart of what I call liberalism—the intelligent conservation and development of our Nation's human and natural potential. * * * We see many young men in the adolescent age group, some already delinquent in the sense of having been caught in serious antisocial activity, and many more, maladjusted, confused, and in the midst of severe adolescent turmoil. Many look ahead to the day when they can "join up" in the armed services, even though many would be unsuited for such duty, simply because it is the only alternative to school or self-defeating idleness.
> I not only often say, but often hear school people, probation workers, police, parents, and casework agency staff workers say: "If there was only something vigorous, useful, aggressive but not destructive that we could find for him to do.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank my able colleague from Minnesota. It is not my desire to break the continuity of his discussion of this important proposal for reenactment of a measure somewhat similar to the Civilian Conservation Corps Act of the 1930's.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; it is that.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I was intensely interested in the enlightening article by the Senator from Minnesota in Harper's magazine. May I say—and these words are not gratuitous—I read it not once, but I read it twice. I did so because I felt the impact of the reasoning of the Senator from Minnesota, as reflected in what I knew was a considerable amount of research, also represents a grasp of the need today, as we had the need a quarter of a century ago. It relates to an important phase of American life.

I hope it is not inappropriate for me to say to my distinguished colleague that when I was in the House of Representatives, during the period of the terrifying years of the depression, I assisted in the drafting of the original measure. I would not attempt to confine the benefits to the State of West Virginia in remarks that I wish to make at this moment, except to say that even now there come to me letters of appreciation from men of middle age, or approaching middle age, who were in the Civilian Conservation Corps activity.

Throughout West Virginia we found that the construction of trails, roads, and firebreaks, and so many, many developments within the woodlands, was a tremendously valuable contribution to the building of a better physical and natural resource within our State.

What the Senator from Minnesota has so well said, I wish to embrace and emphasize; namely, that when we spend a dollar on a program such as the one the Senator from Minnesota envisages in his currently proposed legislation, such a dollar returns, not 100 cents on the investment—and it is an investment—but it returns a dividend as well. It is a dividend, not only in a physical and a natural resource, that constitutes a contribution to a better manhood within the America which the Senator so well serves.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, not merely for his remarks, but for the obvious spirit in which he has made those remarks.

I wish to state again that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] was one of the original authors of the Civilian Conservation Corps legislation. The Senator has made me a happy sponsor of a bill by joining with me with respect to the bill for the Youth Conservation Corps.

I believe it is fair to say, Mr. President, that in the discussion of the bill, I have yet to find anyone among the public opposed to it. I hope, therefore, that the Senate of the United States will give itself the opportunity to adopt legislation along these lines. The bill may need, as we know, some revisions, because no one claims to have sufficient competence alone to perfect legislation. We will want to have hearings on the bill. I hope we will observe the kind of enthusiasm within the Senate and within the other body which the American public seems to show for this particular type of proposal.

Of all the measures I can think of which were passed in the last 25 or 30 years, none has a finer reputation, and I believe none has more open public support than the old CCC camp program. It really made history, Mr. President.

In the Congress of the United States today are some former members of the Civilian Conservation Corps camps. In fact, the distinguished senior Member of the Minnesota delegation, the Representative from the Eighth District of Minnesota, JOHN BLATNIK, was a CCC camp fellow. There was never a finer young man or a finer young Representative. These men learned a great deal in the camps.

As the Senator from West Virginia has said, not only did the program build up great physical resources, but it built character. When the country needed these men in the defense of our Nation, they were healthy, strong, and able to defend themselves because of their contact with the great outdoors.

I thank the Senator from West Virginia. He has been most helpful to me.

Mr. President, I refer again to the expression from the California doctor. This thoughtful California doctor also pressed ahead to suggest an international youth conservation corps where Russian boys might plant trees in the high Sierra along with American boys, Indochinese and African, and the same troupe, with the same spirit, might also plant trees in England or Russia.

Mr. President, this is a similar idea to one I suggested some 2 years ago, to send young Americans as grassroots ambassadors into the backward areas of the world, not only to bring advanced techniques to the villages and towns, but also to bring the spirit of America's fresh, clean, and healthy youngsters to the people of these countries who are suspicious and distrustful of our great national wealth and power.

A county judge in Oregon tells me that in his opinion the savings in lessened costs, for juvenile detention homes and reformatories, from the youth conservation program would almost cover the expense of the project.

A probation officer in the Connecticut adult probation system writes as follows:

> Would the cost be prohibitive? I do not think so, when you consider the ultimate objectives to be gained. * * * Will we not have to spend to build correctional institutions to meet the needs of those increasing numbers of delinquents and more money for more policemen to patrol streets, and in some cases, schools, as is the case in New York at tihs time?
> I believe that such a plan must, in time, be inaugurated.

I digress to point out that the writer refers to the youth conservation plan.

> I have talked to educators, judges, social workers, and police officials and they are unanimous in their approval for such a program. * * * I do not believe that this would cure all our social ills. It would not eradicate delinquency. The causes are too complex and varied for that, but it would be a giant step in working toward their ultimate solution. Can we afford not to?

These form only a very small sample of the kind of response which this proposal has received from professional men and women in the two fields of natural resource conservation and youth conservation. It has heartened and encouraged me. No measure that I have ever introduced has provoked more detailed and enthusiastic response from so broad a spectrum of Americans.

Mr. President, the bill which I shall introduce in a moment does not necessarily outline the very best organization for such a conservation effort. The details should be worked out in consulation with the career conservationists of the State and Federal Governments, and with the advice and counsel of eminent authorities in the field of youth conservation and rehabilitation. I am deeply hopeful that it will be possible to have hearings scheduled on this legislation so that the many interested groups and individuals who have already sought the opportunity to testify may be given the chance to do so.

There is a wealth of experience to draw upon—not only from administrators and scholars who recall the work of the old CCC in the thirties, but also from the many, many skilled individuals who have been engaged in recent years in voluntary, State and county, and even municipal efforts to use the great outdoors, the woods and forests and open country, as an arena for the rehabilitation of young boys. Still others have pioneered work programs for young people not for the purpose of rehabilitation but simply to provide healthy, creative work opportunities for perfectly healthy and untroubled young people.

A common denominator of the experience of these hundreds of individual efforts has been the realization that the economic gains, in terms of greater forest productivity, for example, are important byproducts of the youth conservation work.

Minnesota, under the able leadership of Gov. Orville Freeman, has been for several years developing work programs for delinquent boys, with remarkable success. In 1957, Minnesota's Iron Range Resources and Rehabilitation Commission undertook an experimental program to hire small groups of boys between 17 and 21 to work on timber stand improvement, under the guidance and supervision of a trained forester, in four northern Minnesota counties.

Commissioner Kaarlo Otava reports:

> This type of work is something of a long-range nature. Immediate cash returns are not immediately available, but in the long run this type of work greatly improves the quality and quantity of timber, therefore, natural growth. * * * In addition to providing improvements on county timber stands, this program provides gainful summer employment to a number of boys in certain northern Minnesota areas to enable them to continue their education. The boys are not only given gainful employment during the summer, but they received valuable training in conservation and in working together. * * * When the trees mature and are sold the approximately $30,000 expended on this project will be returned in full in addition to providing quality material to better support local timber-using industries.

Mr. Otava expanded the program last summer to employ about 200 boys, working under 8 foremen not only in timber stand improvement, but also in State parks and camping areas, where a lack of funds had permitted overuse of these areas to run them down severely.

Mr. President, there is much, much experience to draw upon as we contemplate the creation of a Federal program to augment and greatly expand the pioneer and pilot projects already undertaken at the State and local levels. To illustrate this fully, I asked the Library of Congress to prepare a survey of the costs, kinds of work, and accomplishments of youth work programs. This survey was undertaken last fall with the great assistance of Mr. Curtis Gatlin, of the National Child Labor Committee, and contains reports on the juvenile delinquent forestry camps operated by 13 States, the Federal Government, and Salt Lake County, Utah, as well as the part-time programs sponsored by a number of cities, counties, and private volunteer groups.

Although this is not by any means a complete survey—I underscore that statement; it is only a limited survey—it is valuable and informative. It clearly demonstrates that our proposal for a youth conservation corps is grounded on a great deal of varied experience. At the same time, it demonstrates that the sum total of all these local and State efforts is far, far less than the needs of the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a chart summarizing the replies received from a number of administrators of work camps for young boys throughout the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the chart may be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

(See exhibit B.)

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senators MURRAY, BYRD of West Virginia, CHURCH, GRUENING, HART, HENNINGS, JACKSON, JAVITS, JOHNSTON of South Carolina, LANGER, MAGNUSON, MANSFIED, MCCARTHY, MORSE, MOSS, NEUBERGER, PROXMIRE, RANDOLPH, and YARBOROUGH, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill calling for the establishment of a national Youth Conservation Corps of approximately 150,000 young men between the ages of 16 and 22, legislation which will authorize a constructive, meaningful, and economical use of the energies of young Americans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 812) to authorize the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps to provide healthful outdoor training and employment for young men and to advance the conservation, development, and management of national resources of timber, soil, and range, and of recreational areas, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill may be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

(See exhibit C.)

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say that this great America of ours must recover the confidence and daring and imagination that our leaders seem to have lost in recent years. It is time that we begin to consider programs and policies which will bear fruit in 5 years, 10 years, and 20 years, and to lay plans for our Nation's growth and security and welfare which go more than a year or two forward.

What is needed is vision to see the emerging problems and crises of the next decade—the dwindling relative productivity of our natural resources, the shrinking educational plant, the outmoded and already obsolescent highways and airports that are still on the drawing boards. We need to visualize and squarely face the economic competition of the Soviet world. We need to face up to the fact that problems do not solve themselves, and that the future eventually arrives. In fact it is constantly pressing on the plans of today.

There are many other pressing measures which directly bear on the expanded future of our Nation—aid for school construction, scholarships for the gifted, and increased research program across the broad spectrum of science, for example. The youth conservation corps is only one of a series of such positive steps that we should take to insure that our natural and human resources are developed to their full potential, and that our Nation is strengthened for the long pull ahead.

EXHIBIT A

A PLAN TO SAVE TREES, LAND, AND BOYS

Everyday the news bears evidence of an appalling waste of young lives. Shocking juvenile crimes are commonplace on page 1. But no less distressing are the countless minor transgressions more briefly reported from the crowded dockets of magistrates, desk sergeants, and juvenile court judges.

The cost to the United States is beyond all calculation.

This waste of human resources is matched in another field by an outrageous dissipation of our resources of soil and water. From the tidewater East to the mountains of the Far West, wind and water and fire gnaw at the hill spoles and fill our lakes and streams with topsoil. Despite encouraging progress made by conservation programs, sluicing rains tear new gorges in the earth. Millions of acres of cutover forest lands lie abandoned to brush, wind, fire, and insects—ugly and unproductive, at a time when the U.S. Forest Service predicts that our need for lumber and other wood products is rising beyond our expected forest yields.

Muddied and polluted lakes and streams mock the tourist brochures of dozens of States. Park and forest campsites and trails are deteriorating. Even these neglected facilities are crowded today—would-be campers often find only dim echoes of the refreshing outdoor experiences that our parents took for granted 50 years ago.

Such a waste of both human and natural resources need not be tolerated. This was proved a generation ago in a 9-year national experiment that gave us a blueprint for conservation that can teach us a lot today.

The idea for the Civilian Conservation Corps sprang into action almost overnight in March 1933, during the magnificent ferment of the first hundred days of Roosevelt's New Deal. It became one of the most successful projects of the 1930's, acclaimed by both parties.

The theory was simple: We had a lot of young men out of work; outdoor work was good for young men; therefore, let's get the boys out into the woods. Within weeks, the first experimental CCC camp was in operation at Camp Roosevelt, 2 hours west of Washington, D.C., in the green woods of the George Washington National Forest. Reserve Army officers were called back on active duty to supervise the boys, and out into the woods they went with shovel and ax. Within a few months, camps began to mushroom throughout the country, with about 200 boys in each. Within a year, the CCC enrollment had hit its average of 300,000 and until the early forties the CCC boys were working in nearly 2,600 camps in the State and National parks and forests.

What started as a make-work project rapidly developed into the most comprehensive program for the management and conservation of natural resources that any nation had ever undertaken. Frankly improvising, the professional conservationists of the U.S. Forest Service, the National Park Service, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and the Soil Conservation Service shifted into high gear projects that had only been dreams of forestry and conservation technicians.

Conservationists who had despaired of moving beyond the first giant step taken by the pioneers of the Teddy Roosevelt-Gifford Pinchot era—when the major national park and forest areas were set aside for public use—suddenly awoke to find a new force at work. Raw brain and muscle, willing and enthusiastic, became available almost overnight for the long-dreamed work of forest fire prevention, erosion control, timber stand improvement, new outdoor recreational facilities, and earth dam reservoirs.

As the waste motion came under control—as the boys from New York and Chicago, Chattanooga and Los Angeles and a thousand cities and villages across the Nation were trained into effective, skillful teams—millions of acres of land were transformed by reforestation, stripcropping, gully stabilization, and forest fire control.

What happened to the CCC boys themselves—eventually almost 3 million of them—was also fascinating.

The boys put on solid weight. They grew taller. Many had their teeth attended to for the first time. They developed manual skills they had never suspected and later got specialized vocational training—truck driving, machine maintenance, building trades skills. Eventually, training became as important as the actual pick-and-shovel work of conservation. Skilled leaders emerged among the teams of boys and young men working against fire, erosion, and waste in ever more carefully planned projects.

HOW THEY DID IT

Nine years of the CCC built into the national economy and, it may be, into the national character, some extraordinary values. A major start was made in using nearly untried techniques of forestry and soil conservation in the Nation's timber and grazing lands, and our infinitely valuable watersheds. But in terms of the salvage and the strengthening of young lives, many hundreds of thousands of them, the CCC may have made its most important contribution. Former CCC boys are today scattered throughout the leadership of American industry, government, and education—testimony to the social values of this great experiment. I have asked some of them what the CCC meant to them.

A typical comment comes from a marine fishery research biologist:

"It is my honest opinion that my experiences in the CCC during the critical years of my life better prepared me for my years of service overseas with the U.S. Army during World War II * * * an enrollee enjoys a sense of accomplishment, a sense of having contributed something worthy to the Nation."

My good friend, Congressman JOHN BLATNIK, of Minnesota's forested Eighth District, who had just finished teacher's college at the time, became a CCC camp educational adviser. This is what he says about his experience:

"The CCC looked good, and believe me, it was good to me. * * * We worked in warm weather and in cold. There was plenty to do, but we were young. We liked the work; we liked the life; and especially, we liked the opportunity to be a recognized part of American life. * * * [The CCC] was a great movement to renew a spirit of adventure in youth, and to dramatize the protection and restoration of our natural resources."

World War II killed off the CCC, but in its 9 years some great steps had been taken. The teams of boys planted nearly 3 billion trees, built over 150,000 miles of trails and fire lanes. They strung 85,000 miles of new telephone lines and put up 4,000 fire towers, 45,000 bridges, and thousands of buildings.

They built several million check dams against soil erosion, and did improvement cuttings and thinnings on about 4 million acres of forests. They saved millions of acres by prompt fighting of small fires before they got out of control and protected the trees from attacks by insects and diseases. They also helped replace sagebrush with forage grasses on nearly 40 million acres of brushy lands. Altogether, the value of their work has been estimated at $1½ billion—in 1940 dollars, too.

What did it cost? An even $1,000 each year per boy—for everything—overhead, salaries, everything.

HOW MUCH SHOULD WE INVEST?

The demands of World War II mobilization drained away the CCC's manpower, but the conservation needs remained. The job the CCC did until 1942 in putting our forests and farmlands into shape was by no means finished, though the work was put aside temporarily. Conservation programs went on a strictly maintenance basis during the war and have never been resumed on the scale needed.

Today, the children born during World War II are our teenagers—and they are finding a crowded world—not only in the cities, but in the outdoor recreational areas. More than 50 million visitors are now using the national forests alone each year.

A critical shortage of forest products will come by the year 2000 if we do not expand our forestry programs now. Trees take time to grow. And, although our agricultural abundance is a concern today, demographers are predicting scarcity to come, if we continue to allow wind and water to wear away our topsoil at the present rate.

Last summer, the Natural Resources Council, made up of the heads of nationally important conservation groups, completed a searching estimate of the total job needed to bring the corrosive actions of man against nature under control, and to rebuild the productive capacity of our lands and waters enough to sustain the predicted population of 50 years from now.

They came up with some hard figures. Over a 10-year intensive program, they said, we need to invest $3 billion to put our forests into adequate productive shape; $4.5 billion to halt the loss of topsoil and protect vital watersheds; $1 billion to stabilize the soils and increase the forage yields on our western rangelands; $2 billion for the upgrading and expanding of the areas of outdoor recreational facilities; and another $1 billion to improve refuges for wildlife. Many of these represent planned programs in the files of both Federal and State conservation agencies. They do not include the huge conservation needs of our new State of Alaska.

Take just one major resource—forest lands. Professional foresters estimate we have 275 million understocked forest acres in need of timberstand improvement, thinning, eliminating diseased trees, and reducing fire hazard. Another 52 million acres of open, unproductive land should be replanted in trees.

Water and topsoil are not inexhaustible. Yet hundreds of thousands of streams dump silt into our reservoirs and harbors. Stream banks can be stabilized—but only by human hands planting protective vegetation. Federal and State conservation agencies have simply not been able to tackle these and other conservation jobs on anywhere near the scale demanded. Manpower shortages and lack of funds, not ignorance, are holding them back. There is work enough to employ several hundred thousand men for a decade or more—at useful, not make-work, jobs.

AN UP-TO-DATE CORPS

A giant step toward the prevention of delinquency and the improvement of physical fitness could be accomplished if the CCC were in existence today to provide not only healthful, useful outdoor work, but educational opportunities for boys and young men with too much time on their hands.

Dropouts from high school, and even a considerable proportion of high school graduates, find it increasingly difficult to secure jobs with any future. Despite the sharp increases in college enrollment, millions of young men will not go on to higher education. Instead, they will flow directly into a labor market which is at best inhospitable for teenagers, and during recessions is forbidding.

I am convinced that we must again provide the kind of opportunity for creative work on the land that was given to American boys in the thirties. I introduced legislation to accomplish this during the last session of Congress, and Congressman BLATNIK introduced a companion bill in the House. We expect to bring the measure up again in the new Congress, shortly after this article appears.

Briefly, the bill would establish a somewhat smaller, more flexible, and more education-oriented organization than the old CCC—a Youth Conservation Corps of 150,000 young men. It would be decentralized among the Federal and State conservation agencies in relatively small groups as compared with the old 200-man CCC camps.

The boys would improve young timber stands by thinning, help carve new access roads and trails into the forest areas, plant seedlings on bare lands, stabilize eroding stream banks by hand planting. They would construct picnic area facilities, retaining walls, erect earth dams to create upstream reservoirs, improve lakes, streams, and marshes for fish and wildlife, rebuild game cover, team up for fighting forest fires and reseeding deteriorated rangelands.

It would be hard, dusty, and rugged work, but if I know American boys they would fight to participate.

Recruitment and overall budgetary control, the responsibility for the maintenance of minimum standards for working hours, and for health and educational programs, would be in the hands of a Director under the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. An Advisory Board from the Departments of Agriculture; Interior; and Health, Education, and Welfare would consult on policy with the Director.

But once the boys are processed through the YCC recruiting and orientation period, they should be assigned directly to small units of perhaps 50 or less under the immediate supervision and direction of professional foresters and conservationists of the U.S. Forest Service, the National Park Service, the Fish and Wildlife Service, the Soil Conservation Service, and the State conservation departments.

The boys would be put into on-the-job training situations throughout the conservation field—good, vigorous outdoor work under careful supervision. But, in addition, I propose the development of well-articulated health and educational programs for the enrollees quite apart from their conservation work. In fact, 20 percent of their time is explicitly to be set aside for educational purposes, making use of the facilities of schools and junior colleges in the vicinity of the projects.

Enrollees would be paid at the current rate of a private in the Army—about $78 per month—plus subsistence, medical care, and other fringe benefits. They would sign up for 1 year, or for special vacation period enrollments for students. Enrollment would be open to any American boy, of course, regardless of race or creed or color, who is at least 16 years old, and physically qualified.

Like the old CCC, the YCC would also provide for the enrolling of a small percentage of more mature skilled woodsmen and other conservation workers to provide a leavening of older heads and skills for the groups of inexperienced young men. In areas close to or actually inside Indian reservations, special provision would be made to give work opportunities to tribesmen on their own lands. This would relieve an acute and chronic unemployment problem in the reservations, and also serve to lace the pool of manpower with another good measure of woods skills.

PEOPLE ARE ASKING FOR—

There has been a heartening response to my proposal from around the Nation. Juvenile court authorities, social welfare people, State, and private conservation officials—and many young men themselves interested in enrolling in the corps—have written me all through 1958 suggesting minor changes, advocating different emphases but, without a single exception, strongly favoring the proposal.

A juvenile court judge in Ohio, for example, asked me if I would consider reducing the minimum age to 16. In Ohio, he pointed out, "a boy may be released from school if he has passed the seventh grade and is 16 years of age. Lowering the age to 16 would therefore enable the boy who is maladjusted in school to get a working certificate and enroll in the Youth Conservation Corps."

A superintendent of a work camp for delinquent boys in Minnesota wrote that his 7 years with the old CCC and his 5 years with the Minnesota Youth Conservation Commission were "the most satisfying of my life" and outlined detailed conservation projects which could be undertaken in his area.

Stressing that the group between 14 and 18 is his particular interest, a Missouri superintendent of schools said:

"We have no institution between the public school and reform school to take care of the boy who is (1) a poor student and not interested in school; (2) one who has family problems and is emotionally maladjusted; or (3) one who has no opportunity to earn the money he feels he needs and that to him is more important than an education."

Many correspondents raise tough questions. For example: what about something for the girls? That gets us into a whole series of new considerations, and will be the subject, I am sure, of separate legislation and a separate program. The answer, of course, is that there should be something for the girls—something beyond the scouting years, and of a serious, constructive nature—that would involve practical conservation work without the heavy, load-lifting duties of the young men.

Another interesting question is whether service in the YCC should be counted as part of the fulfillment of obligatory military service. Undeniably, the body building of outdoor work would greatly increase the general state of physical fitness of our young men. Yet I strongly feel that young men would enroll in the conservation corps without the added incentive of being able to write off a year's reserve service requirement, and I am inclined to feel that at this time we should leave the military training to the numerous and competent Reserve and National Guard programs.

The CCC left no bad taste. Even the bitterest opponents of the New Deal had to admit that the CCC was a sound investment in both people and the land. And millions of American families taking to the fields and woods today constantly run across reminders of the constructive CCC work of a generation ago. Among them are thousands of loyal CCC alumni who take pride in revisiting the woods trails, recreation areas, and upstream reservoirs, the burgeoning stands of young timber, the renewed game cover and green stream banks on which they worked as very young men.

Americans, until our very recent urbanization, have always been outdoorsmen. Only recently has the privilege of living and working in the open been denied to so many of our younger generation. For hundreds of thousands of city boys, the opportunity to work on the land could enrich and strengthen their lives. Too, it might provide a new sense of meaning and purpose for young men growing up in a society in which the opportunity for creative accomplishment is becoming rarer each year. Eleanor Roosevelt once said that conservation programs in which young men worked to save our natural resources might serve as a moral equivalent of war needed to inspire young men's loyalties and their dreams.

I am convinced that young men in substantial numbers would seize the opportunity to roll up their sleeves and join a great national effort on the land. The challenge of a task that transcends the mere earning of a living, the chance to participate in a purposeful effort, would be far more important to such young men than the nominal wages and subsistence. I know a dozen young men from stable, middle-income families who would give their eyeteeth for such an opportunity.

And could anything more effectively and constructively channel those restless energies that today are leading tens of thousands of underprivileged boys in the direction of delinquency, violence and self-destruction?

S. 812

A bill to authorize the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps to provide healthful outdoor training and employment for young men and to advance the conservation, development, and management of national resources of timber, soil, and range, and of recreational areas

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Youth Conservation Act of 1959."

STATEMENT OF PURPOSES

SEC. 2. The purpose of this Act is (1) to provide the opportunity for healthful training and employment of young men in carrying out programs of conservation of natural resources planned and designed by, and under the immediate supervision of, the various Federal agencies charged with the responsibility of planning and carrying out such programs; (2) to provide immediate work opportunities for certain unemployed men and Indians living in areas which are far from major centers of population and from major public works of a construction nature; and (3) to enable the Federal agencies charged with the responsibility of conserving and developing natural resources to accelerate programs planned by such agencies to fulfill such responsibility through the utilization of such persons.

YOUTH CONSERVATION COMMISSION

SEC. 3. There is established within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a commission to be known as the Youth Conservation Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"). The Commission shall be composed of six members as follows: A representative of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and shall serve as Chairman of the Commission; a representative of the National Park Service, a representative of the U.S. Forest Service, a representative of the Bureau of Land Management, a representative of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and a representative of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior; and a representative of the Soil Conservation Service to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Members of the Commission shall be reimbursed for actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses incurred while engaged in the authorized functions of the Commission.

FUNCTIONS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4. (a) The Commission shall advise the Director of the Youth Conservation Corps established under this Act with respect to (1) the conservation and educational programs carried on by such corps, (2) the operation of such corps in general, and (3) the criteria for the selection of enrollees of the corps.

(b) Each member of the Commission who represents a Federal agency shall act in a liaison capacity between the agency represented by him and the Director of the Youth Conservation Corps in working out agreements between such agency and the Director for the utilization of the enrollees of such corps in programs of conservation, development, and management of natural resources and of recreational areas planned and designed by such agency.

TECHNICAL AND CLERICAL ASSISTANCE FOR COMMISSION

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") is authorized and directed to provide the Commission with such technical, clerical, and other assistance as may be necessary to carry out its functions.

ESTABLISHMENT OF YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS

SEC. 6. In order to carry out the purposes of this Act, there is hereby established within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a Youth Conservation Corps (hereinafter referred to as the "corps") which shall be administered and directed by a director who shall be appointed by, and under the supervision of, the Secretary and whose salary shall be $——— per annum.

AUTHORITY OF DIRECTOR

SEC. 7. The Director shall, with the advice of the Commission and the approval of the Secretary, have authority—

(1) to formulate rules and regulations for the operation of the corps;

(2) to appoint, without regard to the civil service laws and regulations, the principal subordinate officials of the corps, and to appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws and regulations, such other civilian personnel as he deems necessary for the efficient and economic discharge of the functions of the corps, the compensation of all such appointees to be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended;

(3) to establish minimum standards of health, morals, and education for enrollees of the corps;

(4) to enter into agreements with Federal agencies charged with the responsibility of conserving, developing, and managing the natural resources of the Nation, and of developing, managing, and protecting recreational areas whereby the enrollees of the corps may be utilized by such agencies in carrying out, under the immediate supervision of such agencies, programs planned and designed by such agencies to fulfill such responsibility;

(5) to enter into agreements with and otherwise cooperate with other departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the Federal Government in carrying out the purposes of this act;

(6) to provide a system of educational services to enrollees of the corps under which not less than ten hours per week will be devoted to general education and vocational and conservation education; and

(7) to formulate such other rules and regulations, establish such other procedures, enter into such contracts and agreements, and generally perform such functions as he may deem necessary or desirable to carry out the provisions of this Act.

ENROLLMENT

SEC. 8. (a) The corps shall be composed of a total of not more than one hundred and fifty thousand unmarried male individuals who are citizens of the United States, of good character and health, and who are not less than sixteen nor more than twenty-two years of age, except that not more than 15 per centum of all the individuals enrolled in the corps at any one time may be of an age in excess of twenty-three years if such individuals possess special conservation skills and reside in an area in which a conservation project is being undertaken by the corps. If at any time less than 10 per centum of the total enrollment of the corps is composed of Indians living on reservations upon which, or near which, a conservation project is being undertaken by the corps, the Director, in accepting applications for enrollment in the corps, shall give priority to applications submitted by such Indians until such time as 10 per centum of the total enrollment of the corps is composed of such Indians.

(b) In order to enroll as a member of the corps an individual must agree to comply with rules and regulations promulgated by the Director for the government of members of the corps.

(c) Enrollment in the corps shall be for a period of one year or such lesser time or times, including vacation periods for students, as may be established by the Director.

COMPENSATION, QUARTERS, SUBSISTENCE, AND SO FORTH, FOR ENROLLEES

SEC. 9. (a) (1) The base compensation of enrollees shall be at a rate equal to that provided by law for the compensation of the lowest rank of enlisted personnel in the Army.

(2) The Director shall establish procedures designed to enable any enrollee who desires to do so to make an allotment to his parent, legal guardian, or any educational fund established for his benefit of part of the periodic compensation to which he is entitled under this Act, and such allotment shall be paid directly to the person or fund in favor of which it is made.

(b) In addition to compensation authorized in subsection (a), enrollees shall be furnished with such quarters, subsistence, transportation, equipment, medical services, and hospital services as the Director may deem necessary or appropriate for their needs. Such quarters, subsistence, transportation, equipment, medical services, and hospital services may be furnished to enrollees of the corps directly by the Director or through the Federal agencies under the direction and supervision of which such enrollees are working under agreements between the Director and such agencies which provide for reimbursement to such agencies from funds appropriated for the corps.

SEC. 10. Existing provisions of law with respect to hours of work, rate of compensation, sick leave, vacation, unemployment compensation, life insurance, and compensation for sickness or temporary injury of Federal employees shall not be applicable to any individual because of enrollment in the corps, but the provisions of the Federal Employees Compensation Act with respect to permanent disability and death shall be applicable to enrollees of the corps.

SUPPLIES, MATERIALS, AND EQUIPMENT

SEC. 11. The Director may expend such amounts as he deems necessary for supplies, materials, and equipment for enrollees to be used in connection with their work, instruction, recreation, health, or welfare.

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 12. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, there is authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1960, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years not to exceed $375,000,000, and for each fiscal year thereafter such amount as the Congress may determine to be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I take this occasion to call upon the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] for any observations he may care to make. At times we have been castigated for having no Republican Senators present in the Chamber. We might well adjourn this body right now, but we would not do so, because I understand that one or two Democratic Senators have speeches to make. I yield to the Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, for any observations he may choose to make.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank my distinguished colleague from Kentucky.

There was a wide expanse on the other side of the aisle, undotted by any human personality, until our very distinguished friend and colleague from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] walked in. I am delighted that he entered the Chamber, because the other evening, while he was delivering a most eloquent and constructive address, fairly studded with solid, sound recommendations in the entire field of peace and disarmament, the observation was made, when our monitors were in the cloakroom for a moment, that there was no good, worthy apostle of the GOP on the floor, and that therefore the party ought to be abolished.

I was about to make an equivalent recommendation——

Mr. HUMPHREY. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. But my friend from Minnesota has saved the day, and I salute him for doing so.

I may recur to the same subject matter at some future time. My friend from Minnesota may recall that it was our distinguished compatriot from the great Commonwealth of Louisiana [Mr. LONG] who made that observation.

But there will be more force and substance to an equivalent comment at some time when there is a good, fat money bill before the Senate. Then I shall really take our unregenerate brethren on the other side of the aisle to task for not being present while the Public Treasury is being touched and taxed for a substantial sum.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let me say that if the Public Treasury is touched and taxed while we are not present, the responsibility can fall only on the other side.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the initiative will always come from the Senator's side.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct. The Democratic Party is filled with initiative. [Laughter.]

I thank the Senator.

FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF LAUNCHING OF SATELLITE EXPLORER I

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the citizens of Alabama are proud of the important part which the Redstone Arsenal, at Huntsville, Ala., played in the first successful launching of the free world satellite Explorer I.

I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that in commemoration of the first anniversary of the Army's successful launching of this satellite on Saturday, January 31, 1959, at 3 o'clock p.m., the Secretary of the Army will present a full-scale replica of the Army's Jupiter C missile and satellite to the Smithsonian Institution for permanent retention. The presentation will take place at the outdoor missile site, in the northwest area of the Arts and Industries Building, Jefferson Drive and Ninth Street NW. Members of Congress and the public are invited to attend these ceremonies.

Mr. President, in connection with that matter, I should like to say that there is to be a celebration or ceremony here in Washington to commemorate the first anniversary of this event. It will end with a banquet at the Willard Hotel on Saturday night, January 31, at which the presiding officer will be Dr. Rowland F. Kirks, president of the George Washington Chapter of the Army of the United States of America. The toastmaster will be the Secretary of the Army, the Hon. Wilber M. Brucker. Among the invited speakers will be Maj. Gen. J. B. Medaris, commanding general, Army Ordnance Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal; Dr. Wernher von Braun, technical director, Army Ballistic Missile Agency; Dr. William H. Pickering, director, Jet Propulsion Laboratory; Dr. James A. Van Allen, State University of Iowa; and Dr. Maurice Dubin, Cambridge Research Center.

Mr. President, included among those who have been especially invited to the banquet are representatives of about 14 firms who have been associated in the project of placing Explorer I in orbit around the earth. It might be well to name those firms. We take pleasure in the fact that 4 of the 14 firms are either Alabama firms or have divisions in Alabama, and have contributed greatly to the building of the Explorer missile and the Jupiter-C missile, and the other great missiles which have been developed and produced at the Redstone Arsenal.

Among those companies are the Brown Engineering Co., which is a fine young small business at Huntsville, Ala., and which has made a tremendous contribution and is now making splendid contributions in the missile field. Another one is the Reynolds Metals Co., which is engaged in the production of aluminum in the Tennessee Valley at Muscle Shoals, Ala. Their principal plant is named Lister Hill. The Reynolds Metals Co. built the carrier part of the Explorer missile and is still engaged in building the Jupiter-C and other missiles.

There is also the Chrysler Corp., which maintains a Huntsville Division in connection with the production of the Jupiter-C missile.

Then there is the General Electric Co., which has a division at Redstone Arsenal in connection with this operation. Other companies are the General Telephone & Service Corp.; Consultants & Designers, Inc.; J. H. Elliott; Sprague Electric Co.; Ford Instrument Co.; Globe Industries, Inc.; Cooper Development Corp; Rocketdyne; Philco Corp.; and the Grand Central Rocket Co.

This will be a great celebration, and it is one in which all of us should take a great deal of interest and pride, because it marks the first anniversary of the first successful effort on the part of the free world to place in orbit around the earth an earth satellite.

RESOLUTION DEALING WITH THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ACT

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD the text of a resolution adopted by the Pennsylvania Rural Electric Association at a regular meeting of the board at Fort Bedford Inn, Bedford, Pa., January 21 and 22, with reference to Senate Resolution 21, submitted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], and cosponsored by a number of other Senators, including myself.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas on July 21, 1958, the Comptroller General of the United States issued a ruling construing the provisions of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, which state that loans will be made thereunder to serve any persons in rural areas not receiving central station electric service to mean, in effect, that the act authorized loans to serve unserved areas rather than unserved persons, and that loans cannot therefore be made to furnish electricity to persons without such service if a power company, unwilling or unable to serve them, happens to have lines in the general area; and

Whereas such ruling is potently contrary to the legislative intent of the Congress in enacting such act, and, if enforced to its inescapable conclusion, will seriously undermine the functioning of all rural electric cooperative companies to the detriment of their members, and to the curtailing of the benefits of electric power to large numbers of the citizenry of this country residing in rural areas; and

Whereas it is now of the greatest importance that the Congress reaffirm in unmistakable terms its legislative intent in enacting the aforesaid provisions of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Pennsylvania Rural Electric Association consisting of 13 rural electric cooperative companies serving upward of 70,000 citizens of Pennsylvania in its rural areas, endorses and approves Senate Resolution 71 submitted by Senator GEORGE AIKEN and cosponsored by Pennsylvania's Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK, which would appropriately reaffirm the legislative intent above mentioned; and be it further

Resolved, That the members of this association pledge their best efforts to support and promote the passage of such resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That we unanimously commend Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK for his sponsorship of such resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary to Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK and to Senator GEORGE AIKEN.

URBAN RENEWAL LEGISLATION

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as Senators have been put on notice, it is hoped that the annual omnibus housing bill will be debated by the Senate in the reasonably near future. Hearings have been concluded under the able direction of the chairman of the Housing Subcommittee, the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

During these hearings, one of the principal issues has been the level at which urban renewal in the cities of America should be authorized to proceed.

At the present time, urban renewal has been drastically cut back. City after city has been forced to place its plans on the shelf. This program—which has given our cities the first real hope they have ever had to rip out their slums, clean out the festering centers of disease, delinquency, and crime, and rebuild with decent, sanitary homes—has been slowed down and in some places brought almost to a halt.

To ascertain the effects on each of the individual cities participating in the program, I asked Commissioner Steiner of the Urban Renewal Administration to prepare a tabulation of applications pending in his Administration and the extent to which they have been cut back. I ask unanimous consent that that table be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, that table shows what happened the day that city officials and civic leaders refer to as Black Tuesday—September 8, 1958. On that day, after the housing bill of last year failed to pass, the Urban Renewal Administration had so little money that they were forced to ration what they had available.

The so-called formula limit represents the maximum a city may expect to receive, prorated on a population basis. For cities under 250,000 population, the amount turned out to be so miniscule that cities between 50,000 and 250,000 were allowed to draw 2 years' allocation in advance and cities under 50,000 were allowed 3 years. These cities are indicated on the table with asterisks.

Now, some of us had assumed, since this rationing was introduced as an emergency measure, that the administration would remove it as soon as possible. But we learned in the President's budget message and in the hearings that this formula is to be applied as a permanent feature of the administration's plan.

A glance at the table will show some of the effects on particular cities. Let me emphasize that the figures that appear in the first column represent concrete plans presented as part of each city's approved workable program. Cities are geared up to proceed at this rate, the cooperation of civic leaders has been enlisted, and now they are told in effect to throw away their plans and start over.

The first city listed, Birmingham, Ala., must cut its program in half. Florence, Ala., must reduce its effort by two-thirds. Continuing down the table, we see Little Rock, Ark., cut by more than 75 percent; Bridgeport, Conn., by more than 75 percent; Chicago by almost half and Peoria by almost half; Baltimore by half; Cambridge, Mass., by about two-thirds; Detroit by almost half; St. Louis cut by more than 90 percent; Orange and Trenton, N.J., by more than 75 percent; Buffalo and White Plains, N.Y., by about 85 percent each; Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, in my own State, by about 80 percent; Waco, Tex., by about 70 percent; Milwaukee by over 80 percent; and so on.

Mr. President, the administration has in effect told all of these cities, and many others: "Forget about your grand designs. Prepare to live with your slums. Prepare to continue to let blight spread faster than it is cured. You can do a little bit here and a little bit there, but don't try to do anything really effective, because the United States of America simply can't afford it."

We asked Commissioner Steiner at what figure the urban renewal authorization would have to be set in order that cities could proceed as planned under their approved workable programs. He said that net applications filed—in other words, new applications less revisions and cancellations, had been running about $40 million a month last September, with a gradually increasing trend in evidence. Many cities not yet in the program are, of course, getting ready to participate. Projecting this monthly rate, the need is for at least $500 million and probably closer to $600 million if we are going to take the shackles off the urban renewal program and permit it to proceed in the manner that I believe the Congress originally intended—and as it was proceeding prior to "Black Tuesday" last year.

I hope that Senators will study this table before we vote on the urban renewal program next week.

I should also make clear, I believe, that this authorization does not affect next year's budget expenditures, which I—along with other Senators—desire to balance with our revenues. Expenditures under the new authorization will not take place for 3 to 7 years, because it takes that long to get an urban renewal project from the planning to the execution stage.

I hope that when the matter comes before the Senate for a vote, we will authorize enough funds for urban renewal to make it unnecessary to propose rationing. Then I hope that the urban renewal program, which is just getting off the ground, will not receive another disastrous setback such as the one it received on Tuesday, September 8, 1958, known by the mayors of America as "Black Tuesday."

[5] Represents amounts approved as increases in existing project(s), including amounts approved under applications received after Sept. 5.

[6] Reflects transfer of reservations made prior to fiscal year 1959 between projects, as agreed in fiscal year 1958.

[7] Reflects (a) transfer of reservation of $709,022 made prior to fiscal year 1959 to general neighborhood renewal planning operation approved for the same area, plus (b) increase of $1,636,978 in the reservation, subject to formula limit.

[8] New York City had been subject to a limitation of not to exceed 10 percent of available authorization for 1959 prior to beginning of fiscal year and was therefore entitled to have applications up to this amount considered.

[9] Represents revision in amount of reservation requested originally in survey and planning application pending on Sept. 5.

[10] Reflects transfer of reservation made prior to fiscal year 1959 for existing general neighborhood renewal planning operation to urban renewal project approved for planning in the neighborhood area.

[11] Reflects actual amount of reservation requested in application pending on Sept. 5. Amount of $16,384 shown under "Applications pending" reflects a reporting error.

[12] Reflects transfer of reservation made prior to fiscal year 1959 for existing urban renewal project to general neighborhood renewal planning operation approved for the same area.

[13] Reflects (a) transfer of reservations made prior to fiscal year 1959 in amount of $1,304,000 between projects, as agreed in fiscal year 1958, plus (b) new reservations approved in the amount of $4,587,300 subject to formula limit.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, first I commend the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. No member of the subcommittee on Housing or of the full Committee on Banking and Currency has been more faithful or more diligent in his attention to the proposed housing bill than has the able Senator from Pennsylvania. Certainly no one has been more thorough in going into all matters, especially into the subject of urban renewal. Of course, having had the experience of being the mayor of one of America's great cities—Philadelphia—he naturally knows some of the problems first hand.

I may say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, who may not have been here at the moment the discussion took place in the Senate earlier today, that it was more or less agreed among the majority leader, the minority leader, and the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, that we would strive to bring the bill before the Senate next Tuesday. The plan is to have the full committee meet tomorrow, as the Senator knows, and to move as far along the way as we can in marking up the bill, with the hope of completing that phase on Monday, and then reporting the bill to the Senate on Tuesday.

As is customary, in the following week a great many of our friends across the aisle will be away from the city in observance of Lincoln's birthday. It is hoped that we may complete action on the bill before that out-migration begins.

Mr. CLARK. This is the first I have heard of that plan. I must say it startles me a little. I should like to have the opportunity to confer privately with the Senator from Alabama.

I thank him very much for his kind and courteous remarks about me. I only wish they were justified. There is no Member of the Senate who is as great an expert in the whole field of housing as is the distinguished Senator from Alabama. We all look to him for leadership in this regard.

I would rather make what other comments I have with respect to his statement concerning Monday off the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall, of course, look forward to discussing with the Senator from Pennsylvania the whole program as it has already been planned.

I was about to comment on the statement the Senator made regarding the impact on the budget of the housing program proposed either by my bill, the bill which the Senator from Pennsylvania has introduced, the administration bill, or any other bill. I am glad the Senator stated that so far as the 1960 budget is concerned, there is no impact with reference to urban renewal. We shall be using funds which have been allocated in the past.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is entirely correct. I think it is very important to bring that out.

Mr. SPARKMAN. A great many persons have been confused, I think, regarding the sizes of the various programs. For instance, I read in a leading newspaper a few days ago an article written by an outstanding reporter. I have not seen him since that time, but I am looking forward to the opportunity of joshing him a little bit about this.

He said that the housing bill I introduced was an $11 billion bill. In order to attain that figure, he had to include $8 billion of authorizations to the Federal Housing Administration for insurance, which, as the Senator from Pennsylvania and everyone else who follows housing knows, does not involve a single dollar of expenditure.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is absolutely correct. The amount of misinformation which the press has fed to the American people with respect to the budget implications of our housing bill is incredible. The public is simply not being given correct information. In the desire to have a headline indicating vast expenditures, I am afraid the normal interest in accuracy has gone a little bit by the board.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In the same news article to which I have referred, the reporter, who is a good friend of mine, stated that my bill called for $8 billion of additional authorizations for FHA insurance. He said I had gone beyond the administration's request. The administration had asked for $6 billion in authorizations. The Senator from Pennsylvania knows that for the comparable period the administration asked for $12 billion, $6 billion for each year.

Mr. CLARK. As I recall, when the administration representatives were before the committee, they indicated they wanted to take the ceiling off completely; they did not want to have any lid. They wanted the FHA insurance to run to the sky.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not comment on that in any critical sense. I can see that it would make things easier of administration. But the point I wish to make is that so many persons misunderstand the situation and think that money is involved, when, as a matter of fact, the proposal is simply to grant authority to the FHA to insure at a premium, and with more than $700 million in reserves on which they have been making money throughout the years.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator from Alabama agree with me that the possibility of the Government standing any loss on the FHA program as of now, when the program has been in effect for many years, is so remote as not to be worthy of serious discussion?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the Senator is correct. Of course, if we ever got into a deep depression, we would be in trouble, but not simply because of housing; everything else would be involved.

We might remember one thing. In the great depression of the 1930's, one of the things which gave us the most trouble was housing and home mortgages. The Home Owners Loan Corporation was organized for the purpose of digging homeowners out of their troubles. I dare say no one would have had the temerity to suggest, at the time the home owners loan organization was created, that the Government would get out without the loss of a lot of money in that operation. Yet, when the Home Owners Loan Corporation was finally dissolved, after many years of existence, it showed a profit in its operations while digging us out of the deep depression of the 1930's.

Mr. CLARK. If the depression of the 1930's was not sufficient to cause the Home Owners Loan Corporation to lose any money, it is very difficult indeed for me to see how any depression which might occur now, with all the stabilizers which Congress has built into the economy as a result of the experience in the 1930's, could cause a depression severe enough to affect the FHA guaranty. In fact, it would have to be a depression which would really curl Mr. George Humphrey's hair before that could take place.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me come back to the money involved in the housing bills. It is said that the bill I introduced provides $2,100,000,000 for urban renewal. It is true that the bill provides $2,100,000,000, but that is over a period of 6 years—6 years for disposal, and probably 12 to 15 years will be required for final execution.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator agree with me that all we are talking about are grant reservations, and that it takes from 3 to 17 years after the grant reservation has been made before there is any impact on the budget? Perhaps it is from 3 to 5 years before the first impact, but as long as 17 years before the final amount of grant reserves is spent.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Again I call attention to the fact that the administration in its program has proposed $1,550,000,000 for urban renewal. They offer $200 million to finish the present fiscal year, and then a total of $1,350,000,000 for the remaining years.

So there is not a great deal of difference. There is only about $550 million difference between the sum total of their 6-year bill and my 6-year bill, although the administration bill—and this is where the real difference comes—changes the formulas, so that by the end of the period, or 2 or 3 years before the end of the period, the States and cities will be matching, on an equal basis, the funds put up by the Federal Government, whereas under the present formula there is a two-thirds–one-third matching proposal.

Mr. CLARK. As the Senator will recall, the testimony before our committee was that in practically no instance could any municipality afford to make the extra payment which is called for by the administration bill. So the net effect of the passage of that bill, in my judgment, would be the slow strangulation of the urban renewal program.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And there are a few other money items in the bill. But most of them constitute authorizations which will extend over a long period of time, some of them simply as part of a revolving fund which will run through the years.

I have not figured exactly what the impact on the 1960 budget will be; but I am of the opinion that most persons would be absolutely surprised to see the smallness of the impact on that budget.

Mr. CLARK. It so happens that was the figure I was examining earlier today, as it appeared in the testimony we developed in the committee. I think I am accurate in saying that the budgetary impact of urban renewal for the fiscal year 1960 is $104 million; and it will be that amount, regardless of whether the Congress passes any housing bill at all.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; that amount is already included in the President's budget.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, it is.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But I was talking about the impact of either of these measures on the 1960 budget. However, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out, regardless of whose bill is passed or what figure is agreed upon, in the case of urban renewal, the expenditure for the 1960 fiscal year is already established at $104 million, as he has pointed out; and the same situation applies in regard to several other measures.

As a matter of fact, one of the items in the bill which I recall would require a direct appropriation and would have some impact on the budget is an item—in both my bill and the administration bill—of $10 million to aid the smaller cities and towns to plan their programs. As the Senator from Pennsylvania will recall, by means of the last program of that type, under section 701, $10 million was made available; and that amount ran over a period of 6 or 7 years. I think the largest single appropriation made in any one year was only a little more than $2 million. But even in that case, an appropriation of only $1 million or $2 million a year would be required.

Mr. CLARK. The college housing program would have a modest impact on the 1960 budget, depending on the amounts Congress votes. But I, for one, believe we could make no better expenditure at any time during the session than one which would make it possible for our colleges to move ahead.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And, of course, the administration itself is asking for additional funds for that program.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. So, Mr. President, I have felt that a great many persons have been misinformed regarding the housing program. Many of the newspapers refer to "the wild-eyed liberal programs that the Democrats are proposing."

Mr. CLARK. And to "the wild-eyed wing of the Democratic Party."

Mr. SPARKMAN. But the figures do not support such claims. Many persons who reach such a conclusion are not considering the money appropriations at all.

I wish very much that everyone would understand fully what a relatively small amount of money is involved in these various programs, most of which in the long run return a profit to the Government.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for allowing me to make that comment.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Matthew 8: 26: Jesus said unto them, why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?

O Thou God of all grace, we are again coming unto Thee in the fellowship of prayer, seeking together those needed blessings which none can ever find or enjoy alone.

We humbly and earnestly beseech Thee to emancipate us from those fears which so frequently enslave us with a sense of futility and frustration.

Bless us with a larger measure of faith and enable us to lay hold upon Thy glorious promise that they who wait upon the Lord shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 27, 1959, was read and approved.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 64

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable George H. Christopher, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until 12 o'clock meridian tomorrow.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 57. Concurrent resolution providing that the two Houses of Congress commemorate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

(For President's message see pp. 1297–1298 of Senate proceedings of January 28, 1959.)

AGRICULTURE PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 59)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

There are produced, in the United States, some 250 farm commodities. The law has required that prices of 12 of these be supported at prescribed minimum levels. It is this requirement, together with the level of required support, that has created our farm surplus problems. Farmers who produce cattle, hogs, poultry, fruits, vegetables, and various other products, the prices of which are not supported—as well as those who produce crops the prices of which are supported at discretionary levels—have generally experienced growing markets rather than a buildup of stocks in warehouses.

Three of the 12 mandatory products (wheat, corn, and cotton) account for about 85 percent of the Federal inventory of price-supported commodities though they produce only 20 percent of the total cash farm income.

The price-support and production-control program has not worked.

1. Most of the dollars are spent on the production of a relatively few large producers.

Nearly a million and a half farms produce wheat. Ninety percent of the expenditures for price support on wheat result from production of about half of those farms—the largest ones.

Nearly a million farms produce cotton. Seventy-five percent of the expenditures for cotton price support result from production of about one-fourth of these farms—the largest ones.

For other supported crops, a similarly disproportionate share of the expenditure goes to the large producers.

For wheat, cotton, and rice producers who have allotments of 100 acres or more, the net budgetary expenditures per farm for the present fiscal year are approximately as follows: Wheat, $7,000 per farm; cotton, $10,000 per farm; rice, $10,000 per farm.

Though some presently unknown share of these expenditures will eventually be recovered through surplus disposal, the final cost of the operation will undoubtedly be impressively large.

Clearly, the existing price support program channels most of the dollars to those who store the surpluses and to relatively few producers of a few crops. It does little to help the farmers in greatest difficulty. For small operators the rural development program approach, which helps develop additional sources of income, has clearly demonstrated that it is a far better alternative.

2. The control program doesn't control.

Mandatory supports are at a level which so stimulates new technology and the flow of capital into production as to offset, in large part, the control effort.

Despite acreage allotments and marketing quotas, despite a large soil bank program and despite massive surplus disposal, Government investment in farm commodities will soon be at a new record high. On July 1, 1959, total Government investment in farm commodities will total $9.1 billion. Investment in commodities for which price support is mandatory will total $7.6 billion, of which $7.5 billion will consist of those crops designated by law as basic commodities: wheat, corn, cotton, rice, peanuts, and tobacco. And these stocks are increasing rather than diminishing.

We already hold such huge stocks of wheat that if not one bushel of the oncoming crop were harvested we would still have more than enough for domestic use, export sales, foreign donation, and needed carryover for an entire year.

3. The program is excessively expensive.

When the 1958 crops have come into Government ownership, the cost, in terms of storage, interest and other charges, of managing our inventory of supported crops, for which commercial markets do not exist at the support levels, will be running at a staggering rate, in excess of a billion dollars a year. Unless fundamental changes are made, this annual cost will rise.

This sum is approximately equal to the record amount being spent in fiscal 1960 by the Federal Government on all water resource projects in the United States including power, flood control, reclamation, and improvement of rivers and harbors.

During the present fiscal year, the net budgetary outlay for programs for the stabilization of farm prices and farm income will be $5.4 billion; $4.3 billion of this is for commodities for which price supports are mandatory. While some unpredictable part of this outlay will be recovered in later years through sales for dollars, sales for foreign currency and through barter, the cost will be great, especially when compared with the net income of all farm operators in the United States, which in 1958 was $13 billion. Budgetary expenditures primarily for the support of farm prices and farm income are now equal to about 40 percent of net farm income.

Not a bushel of wheat nor a pound of cotton presently is exported without direct cost to the Federal Treasury.

Heavy costs might be justifiable if they were temporary, if they were solving the problems of our farmers, and if they were leading to a better balance of supplies and markets. But unfortunately this is not true.

These difficulties are not to be attributed to any failure on the part of our farm people who have done an outstanding job of producing efficiently. They have in fact responded to the price incentive as farm people—and other people—traditionally have.

Our farm families deserve programs that build markets. Instead they have programs that lose markets. This is because the overall standards for the programs that they have are outdated relationships that existed nearly half a century ago. This was before 60 percent of our present population was born.

At that time it took 106 man-hours to grow and harvest 100 bushels of wheat. In recent years it has taken not 106 but 22. Since then the yield of wheat has doubled. Similar dramatic changes have occurred for other crops.

It is small wonder that a program developed many years ago to meet the problems of depression and war is ill-adapted to a time of prosperity, peace, and revolutionary changes in production.

The need to reduce the incentives for excess production has been explicit in the three special messages on agriculture which I have previously sent to the Congress. The point has repeatedly been made by the Secretary of Agriculture in his testimony and in his statements to the Congress. The Congress has moved in the right direction but by an insufficient amount. There has been a general tendency to underestimate the pace at which farm technology has been moving forward. Hence there has been a tendency to underestimate the production-inducing effect of the prescribed minimum price support levels.

RECOMMENDATION

I recommend that prices for those commodities subject to mandatory supports be related to a percentage of the average market price during the immediately preceding years. The appropriate percentage of the average market price should be discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture at a level not less than 75 and not more than 90 percent of such average in accordance with the general guidelines set forth in the law. Growers of corn, our most valuable crop, have already chosen, by referendum vote, program changes which include supports based on such an average of market prices.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to advise the gentleman from Michigan, if he persists in the point of order, I intend to make a motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the only reason I am making the point of order, I will say to the majority leader, is so that all the Members might finish their discussions and then we could have the message read. Of course, in deference to the majority leader, I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will continue to read.

The Clerk read the remainder of the message, as follows:

If, despite the onrush of science in agriculture, resulting in dramatic increases in yields per acre, the Congress still prefers to relate price supports to existing standards, the Secretary should be given discretion to establish the level in accordance with the guidelines now fixed by law for all commodities except those for which supports presently are mandatory.

Either of these changes would be constructive. The effect of either would be to reconcile the farm program with the facts of modern agriculture, to reduce the incentive for unrealistic production, to move in the direction of easing production controls, to permit the growth of commercial markets and to cut the cost of Federal programs.

As we move to realistic farm programs, we must continue our vigorous efforts further to expand markets and find additional outlets for our farm products, both at home and abroad. In these efforts, there is an immediate and direct bearing on the cause of world peace. Food can be a powerful instrument for all the free world in building a durable peace. We and other surplus-producing nations must do our very best to make the fullest constructive use of our abundance of agricultural products to this end. These past 4 years our special export programs have provided friendly food-deficit nations with $4 billion worth of farm products that we have in abundance. I am setting steps in motion to explore anew with other surplus-producing nations all practical means of utilizing the various agricultural surpluses of each in the interest of reinforcing peace and the well-being of friendly peoples throughout the world—in short, using food for peace.

Certain details regarding the needed changes in law, particularly with reference to wheat, are appended to this message in the form of a memorandum to me from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Difficulties of the present program should not drive us to programs which would involve us in even greater trouble. I refer to direct payment programs, which could soon make virtually all farm people dependent, for a large share of their income, upon annual appropriations from the Federal Treasury. I refer also to various multiple price programs, which would tax the American consumer so as to permit sale for feed and export at lower prices.

To assist the Congress in discharging its responsibility, the administration stands ready, as always, to provide the appropriate committees with studies, factual data and judgments. Continuation of the price support and production control programs in their present form would be intolerable.

I urge the Congress to deal promptly with this problem.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1959.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a resolution (H. Res. 144) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on District of Columbia: Alvin E. O'Konski, Wisconsin; Wint Smith, Kansas; Steven B. Derounian, New York; Jessica McC. Weis, New York.

Committee on Government Operations: Robert R. Barry, New York.

Committee on Post Office and Civil Service: Katharine St. George, New York.

Committee on Science and Astronautics: R. Walter Riehlman, New York.

Committee on Veterans' Affairs: Seymour Halpern, New York.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM McKINLEY: A TRIBUTE TO A SON OF OHIO

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEVINE].

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, today is the birthday of William McKinley, and I wish to pay tribute to this illustrious citizen of Ohio on behalf of my colleagues from the State of Ohio.

In the Congressional Directory, published 82 years ago, appears McKinley's modest biography as one of the newly elected Members of the 45th Congress.

Up to that time young McKinley had made a gallant record as a soldier. He was then to make an even greater record as a statesman.

Schooled in Ohio, and at Allegheny College, Pennsylvania, McKinley had taught in a rural school before he enlisted as a private in the Union Army.

In 1867 young McKinley opened a law office at Canton, where he maintained his permanent residence, and 2 years later was elected prosecuting attorney.

He married the daughter of a local banker, and two daughters were born to them. Both girls passed away and thereafter Mrs. McKinley became an invalid. The devotion of the rugged McKinley to his frail wife has remained a touching example of love and fidelity through the years.

In front of the State House in Columbus, Ohio, there appears a monument to William McKinley. It was placed in that position for this reason: While Governor of the State of Ohio he lived at a hotel immediately across the street from the State House. Each morning as he left the hotel he would stop at the very spot where the monument is placed and he would turn and wave to his invalid wife who sat in the hotel window.

He also had another habit of wearing a red carnation, that the Members are wearing today. It was his favorite flower, and in tribute to President McKinley the State adopted the red carnation as the official flower of the State of Ohio.

William McKinley was first elected to Congress at the age of 34. In his first term, he allied himself with the Silver Republicans from the Western States. At the end of the year Speaker S. J. Randall placed him on the Committee on Ways and Means. In 1889 he became chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in charge of the new tariff bill. McKinley was, throughout the ensuing debate, the moderator and harmonizer.

Although he had served four terms, McKinley was defeated for Congress in 1890, but he was elected Governor of Ohio in the strenuous campaign of the next year. In 1893 he was reelected Governor.

During his years as Governor, McKinley worked successfully to improve Ohio's canals, roads, and public institutions. One of his greatest achievements was the establishment of a State board of arbitration to settle disputes between employers and employees. He was a national figure by the time he left the governorship.

In 1897 William McKinley became the 25th President of the United States. His first inaugural address, delivered March 4, 1897, reads as though it had been written to meet present problems. He said, and I quote:

> The severest economy must be observed in public expenditures, and extravagance stopped wherever it is found, and prevented wherever in the future it may be developed. * * * The Government should not be permitted to run behind or increase its debts in times like the present. * * * The best way for a government to maintain its credit is to pay as it goes.

During his years in the White House, he did a great service to our Nation. New and difficult problems were wisely solved and the large issues were met in a spirit of finest patriotism and public service. Conciliatory and gracious, respectful of his opponent's point of view, President McKinley never would consent to belittle those who did not see eye to eye with him. He would have recoiled at the thought of a smear campaign. He cherished no ambition to be the master of anyone, he refused to indulge in personalities. Selfish groups did not intimidate him.

President McKinley's friends considered his amiability his greatest fault. As Jefferson said of Washington, "He erred with integrity." He was a man of deep and sincere religious faith. His career demonstrated that success with one's fellow man is not incompatible with an earnest Christian life.

It has been said that President McKinley's last speech was his best. He had grown steadily as a public speaker, just as he had grown in every other way, until he had become one of the great orators of his time.

It was not expected that his address at the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo on September 5, 1901, would be especially important. Yet many thousands waited in front of the temporary stand on the exposition grounds to hear him deliver it. They were rewarded with a remarkable address. It was felt that he was laying before the whole world his purposes for the remainder of his administration. No one had the slightest idea that he would never again speak in public. But the following day—September 6, 1901—President McKinley was shot by an anarchist and died 8 days later.

I would like to quote briefly from President McKinley's last speech nearly 60 years ago:

> God and man have linked the nations together. No nation can longer be indifferent to any other. And as we are brought more and more in touch with each other, the less occasion is there for misunderstandings, and the stronger the disposition, when we have differences, to adjust them in the court of arbitration, which is the noblest forum for the settlement of international disputes. * * *
> The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, we Members of the 86th Congress would do well to look to William McKinley's personal and political ideals as we mark this anniversary of his birth.

He left this message for all of us as he passed from this life:

> It is God's way. His will, not ours, be done.

The SPEAKER. Without objection all Members who desire may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life, times, and character of Ex-President William McKinley.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 116th anniversary of the birth of William McKinley, who became President of the United States in 1897.

President McKinley was born in the little town of Niles, located in eastern Ohio. His parents were sturdy, middle-class working folks, who descended from Scotch, Irish, and English generations. He attended the Ohio public schools, Poland Academy, and Allegheny College, in Pennsylvania.

During the Civil War William McKinley enlisted on June 23, 1861, and served 4 years in the Union Army, Ohio Volunteers. He enlisted as a private and was mustered out as a brevet major.

After the war he practiced law at Canton, Ohio, served as prosecuting attorney and was first elected to Congress in 1876, serving in the House of Representatives from 1877 to 1882. Then he was defeated, but was elected again in 1886 and served until 1890. During his years in the House he became recognized as a foremost champion of the protective tariff, and gained renown as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. He was elected Governor of Ohio in 1891, was inaugurated on January 11, 1892; reelected in 1893 and served until January 13, 1896.

In 1895 a systematic canvass in McKinley's behalf for the presidential nomination was instituted by his supporters and was continued until the Republican Convention in 1896. He was nominated, and, after an extremely bitter campaign on the issue of the gold standard versus free coinage of silver, was elected as champion of the gold standard.

President McKinley's first term is memorable chiefly for the occurrence of the Spanish-American War. That his policy during 1896–1900 was acceptable was shown by his unanimous renomination and by his reelection in 1900 by an electoral majority of 137. His second term began most auspiciously but ended tragically.

On September 5, 1901, he visited the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo, that day having been set apart in his honor and called the President's Day.

On the afternoon of the following day, while holding a public reception in the Temple of Music, he was shot twice by an anarchist. The wounded President was removed to the residence of the president of the exposition, and died there September 14. He was buried in Canton, Ohio.

It has been told that while a Member of this Congress, friends from McKinley's district advised him that enemies in his district were circulating malicious gossip about him and that he should make a public reply. McKinley answered:

I have no enemies. My constituents have a right to express what they claim to be their opinions. I need criticism and I love those who criticize me. They help me most.

Naturally kindly, a good conciliator, McKinley's strength was in defending principles. He was an earnest and loyal party man. He sought and accepted the advice of trusted associates.

President McKinley was a man of towering presence and wherever he appeared in public, his contemporaries were inspired by his very appearance. He was eloquent in speech.

He married Ida Saxton, cashier in a Canton bank, when he returned from military service. Mrs. McKinley has been called the first business woman to become the first lady. The marriage was one of devoted affection, with the greater need for devotion when, after the birth and early death of two daughters, Ida McKinley became an invalid. President McKinley's care and solicitation never wavered. Mrs. McKinley was at his side at state social affairs, accompanied him on official journeys, and was with him at Buffalo when he was assassinated.

As we honor the birth date of our 25th President, we do not commemorate just a date on the calendar, but rather we commemorate the spirit, the wisdom, and the courage of a man who had a high regard for what he believed to be honest and true, and, in his period, for the best interests of our country.

INVESTIGATIONS AND STUDIES BY THE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 78, to authorize the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to conduct investigations and studies with respect to certain matters within its jurisdiction, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That effective from January 3, 1959, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct full and complete investigations and studies with respect to the following matters within the jurisdiction of the committee:

(1) the administration, management, and operations of the Post Office Department and the postal field service;

(2) the mailability of articles and printed matter generally, including, among other things, the mailing of (A) obscene matter, (B) matter which reasonably may be expected to arouse or activate racial, religious, or class hatred or animosity, and (C) unsolicited articles and matter with requests for payments or contributions;

(3) the application, operation, and effect of the laws, rules, and regulations relating to the management of civilian personnel of the Federal Government, including matters relating to (A) compensation, (B) position classification, (C) examination, (D) appointment, (E) assignment of positions excepted from the competitive service to schedules A, B, and C under rule VI of the Civil Service Rules, (F) allocation of positions to, and distribution of positions in, grades 16, 17, and 18 of the General Schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, (G) actions taken pursuant to section 505(1) of such Act, as amended by Public Law 85-462, (H) promotions, (I) reduction in force, and (J) separation from the service by action other than reduction in force;

(4) the desirability and effect of contracts, agreements, or arrangements for the performance, by and through sources outside the Federal Government, of personal, administrative, and management services;

(5) the effect of the contracting practices of the Federal Government on the availability and utilization of personnel qualified for the performance of essential functions of the Federal Government;

(6) the organization, management, and operations of the United States Civil Service Commission, including the delegation of authority to the department and agency Boards of Civil Service Examiners and the audit and control thereof;

(7) operations under the Classification Act of 1949;

(8) actions taken and directives issued as a result of the investigations and studies, conducted by the committee under authority of H. Res. 32, Eighty-third Congress, H. Res. 304, Eighty-fourth Congress, and H. Res. 139, Eighty-fifth Congress, with respect to the utilization and dual supervision of civilian employees in or under the Department of Defense;

(9) dual supervision of civilian employees, creation of civilian positions, number of civilian positions, and other matters relating to conservation of manpower, in such departments, agencies, and independent establishments of the Federal Government as the chairman of the committee may designate;

(10) (A) the organization, management, and operations of the Bureau of the Census in the Department of Commerce and (B) statistical and related activities other than those of the Bureau of the Census;

(11) insurance plans and programs of the Government for Government employees and related matters; and

(12) the operation and effect of training programs under the Government Employees Training Act.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session), at such time or times during the present Congress as it deems appropriate, the results of its investigations and studies, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution, the committee, or any subcommittee thereof authorized to do so by the chairman of the committee, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the resolution be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 5, insert: "Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual investigatory resolution for the Civil Service Committee and similar to resolutions presented the other day for other committees. It is in line with the resolution granted that committee last year.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this resolution had the unanimous support of all members of the Rules Committee.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Will the gentleman agree with me that the requests of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee have been modest in the past and are now?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I do.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS TO CONDUCT STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 91 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Works, or any subcommittee thereof designated by the chairman, may make investigations into the following matters within its jurisdiction: In the continental United States, its Territories, and possessions, public works projects either authorized or proposed to be authorized relating to flood control and improvement of rivers and harbors, waterpower, navigation, water pollution control, public buildings and grounds, as well as roads and highways; in Mexico, and in Central American countries, the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road; and, in the Dominion of Canada, the Saint Lawrence Seaway project.

For the purpose of making such investigations the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the United States, its Territories, and possessions, whether the House has recessed or adjourned, and to hold such hearings and require by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, and documents as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

The committee may attend conferences and meetings on matters within its jurisdiction wherever held within the continental United States, its Territories, and possessions, but no more than five members of such committee may attend any meeting outside of the continental United States except trips in connection with the investigation of the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road and matters relating to the Saint Lawrence Seaway project in the Dominion of Canada.

The committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject matter which is being investigated by any other standing committee of the House.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "That" insert "effective from January 3, 1959".

Page 1, strike out the following language in lines 4 and 5: "its Territories, and possessions".

Page 1, line 9, change semicolon to period and strike the following language in lines 9, 10, 11, and 12: "in Mexico, and in Central American countries, the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road; and, in the Dominion of Canada, the St. Lawrence Seaway project".

Page 2, line 4, strike "its Territories, and possessions".

Page 2, line 15, change comma after the word "United States" to a period, and strike out the following language in lines 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21: "its Territories, and possessions, but no more than five members of such committee may attend any meeting outside of the continental United States except trips in connection with the investigation of the Inter-American Highway and the Rama Road and matters relating to the Saint Lawrence Seaway project in the Dominion of Canada".

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the minority join in support of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS TO CONDUCT FULL AND COMPLETE INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 113 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That effective from January 4, 1959, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct a full and complete investigation and study of all matters—

(1) relating to the laws, regulations, directives, and policies including personnel pertaining to the Department of State and such other departments and agencies engaged primarily in the implementation of U.S. foreign policy and the overseas operations, personnel, and facilities of departments and agencies of the United States which participate in the development and execution of such policy;

(2) relating to the carrying out of programs and operations authorized by the Mutual Security Act and to other laws and measures to promote the foreign policy of the United States;

(3) relating to activities and programs of international organizations in which the United States participates;

(4) relating to the effectiveness of U.S. programs of assistance and information; and

(5) relating to legislation within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs pursuant to provisions of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places, whether the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, after line 13, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution granting to the Committee on Foreign Affairs authority to investigate matters within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the minority agrees with this resolution.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO CONDUCT CERTAIN STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 105 and ask for its present consideration. May I ask the Clerk when he gets to the reading of the committee amendments to pause as I have a substitute for a committee amendment in one instance.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That effective from January 7, 1959, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct full and complete studies and investigations and make inquiries relating to matters coming within the jurisdiction of such committee, including but limited to the following:

(1) administration and operation of the Federal Maritime Administration and Federal Maritime Board and all laws, international arrangements, and problems relating to the American merchant marine;

(2) administration and operation of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service and all laws and problems relating to fisheries and wildlife;

(3) administration and operation of the Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and all laws and problems relating to functions thereunder;

(4) administration and operation of the Panama Canal and all laws and problems relating thereto, together with the necessity of providing additional transiting facilities for vessels between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

For such purposes the said committee, or any subcommittee thereof authorized to do so by the chairman of the committee, is hereby authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places (A) within the United States, its possessions, the Territory of Hawaii, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Canal Zone; (B) elsewhere within the North American Continent; and (C) elsewhere when in connection with any study or investigation of ocean steamship conferences and the dual rate system, whether the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary: Provided, however, That in no event shall the chairman designate more than seven committee members and three staff members to proceed outside the United States on any one study or investigation of ocean steamship conferences and the dual rate system. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

That the said committee shall report to the House of Representatives during the present Congress the results of their studies and investigations with such recommendations for legislation or otherwise as the committee deems desirable.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 1, strike out "7" and insert "3."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, after line 10, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 12, following the word "thereof" insert the word "as."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 17, after "places" strike out "(A)."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 17, after "places", strike out down to and including the word "system" on line 23 and insert after the word "places" on line 17 the following

"within the United States, its possessions, the Territory of Hawaii, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Canal Zone."

The substitute to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 3, change the colon to a period and strike out the remainder of the sentence.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the minority favors the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 130 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 3, 1959, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs may make investigations and studies as required in connection with bills, resolutions, and other matters referred to it and, more specifically or in addition thereto, in connection with the following matters within its jurisdiction:

(1)(a) The status, progress, and administration of irrigation, reclamation, and other water resources development programs of the Department of the Interior and of other agencies insofar as the latter affect the work of the Department of the Interior with respect to such programs, including (i) policies and procedures relating to such programs, (ii) projects previously authorized, (iii) projects proposed for authorization and construction (including but not limited to the San Luis project in California, the Fryingpan-Arkansas and Juniper projects in Colorado, the Burns Creek project in Idaho, the Spokane Valley project in Washington, the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota, the Mid-State project in Nebraska, the Norman project in Oklahoma, the Vale project in Oregon, and the Cheney project in Kansas), and (iv) developments under the Small Reclamation Projects Act and the Rehabilitation and Betterment Act; (b) compacts relating to the apportionment of interstate waters; (c) the application to Federal agencies and activities of State laws covering the control, appropriation, and distribution of water; and (d) the saline water program.

(2)(a) The administration and operation of the mining and mineral leasing laws, including those which govern the development, utilization, and conservation of oil, gas, and associated resources of the public and other Federal lands; (b) mineral resources of the public lands and mining interests generally, including the condition, problems, and needs of the mining and minerals industries; (c) mineral resources surveys and the exploration, development, production, and conservation of mineral resources; (d) minerals research, including coal research, needed to improve the position of the domestic minerals industries; (e) proposed long-range domestic minerals programs; and (f) the effects upon domestic mining industries of the world metals situation and the means available to the Government for alleviating the same.

(3) The status, progress, and administration of the national park system and its units and of other recreational developments on public lands or under the jurisdiction of or affecting the Department of the Interior.

(4) The administration and operation of the laws governing the development, utilization, and conservation of the surface and subsurface resources of public lands administered by the Department of the Interior and of forest reserves created out of the public domain.

(5)(a) The administration of Indian affairs by agencies of the Government participating therein, the programs and policies of those agencies, the adequacy of existing Indian legislation, and the effectiveness with which it is being administered and with which moneys available to carry out its purposes are being used; (b) the release of Indian tribes and bands from Federal supervision, preparation therefor, and the effects thereof; (c) the present status of Indian treaties and agreements; (d) the availability to Indians of health, education, and welfare services and the extent to which they are receiving the full benefit of Federal programs in these areas; (e) the utilization of tribal land and other resources, with particular attention to the means of developing the skill and aptitudes required for such utilization; (f) problems of fractional heirships and the means of solving them; and (g) the adequacy and cost of attorney services for Indians and Indian tribes.

(6) The status, progress, and administration of the Territories and insular possessions of the United States, Puerto Rico, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, including particularly operations under the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act of 1920, as amended; the return of federally held lands in Hawaii and Puerto Rico to local control and ownership; an analysis and evaluation of the Puerto Rico Commonwealth Act of 1952; the operation and administration of the Revised Virgin Islands Organic Act of 1954, the Virgin Islands Corporation Act of 1949, and the Guam Organic Act of 1950, all as amended (with especial attention, in the case of the latter, to the tax structure and financial problems of the government of Guam); local conditions bearing upon and the provisions to be included in an organic act for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands; matters affecting American Samoa, and problems concerning the civilian population of the Ryukyu Islands.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of making such investigations and studies the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit, hold hearings, and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, its Territories and possessions, Puerto Rico, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Pacific flag areas of the United States as the nature of the investigation or study requires; may do so not only during the session but also during periods of recess and adjournment; and may require, by subpena or otherwise the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member designated by him and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

SEC. 3. In addition, in order that the committee may be informed as to what other nations are doing in the field of water resources development and because such information will be of value to the Congress and to the committee in consideration of matters within the committee's jurisdiction and is pertinent to the duties of the committee under rule XI, clause 26, of the Rules of the House, a special subcommittee of not more than three members of the committee, accompanied by not more than two members of its staff, may visit and, if found appropriate, hold hearings at such places outside the United States as the chairman may designate during adjournment of the House and shall report its findings to the House.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 5, line 2, strike out "its Territories and possessions, Puerto Rico, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Pacific flag areas of the United States,"

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the first committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 15, insert:

"Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 18, strike out section 3.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 20) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That effective from January 4, 1959, the expenses of the investigation and study to be conducted pursuant to H. Res. 19, by the Committee on Armed Services, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $150,000, including expenditures for the employment of a special counsel, investigators, attorneys, experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committe or subcommittee, signed by the chairman of such committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield for this purpose, and it is to ask him to explain to the House the procedure under which the subcommittee of which he is chairman has unanimously approved these several resolutions after full hearings and that the entire Committee on House Administration has also unanimously approved these several resolutions.

Mr. FRIEDEL. The gentleman is correct. I want to say this, that the subcommittee passed every one of these resolutions we have by unanimous vote, and also the full committee by unanimous vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 1, line 1, strike out "4" and insert "3".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLERK FOR NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY PARLIAMENTARIANS' CONFERENCE

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 36) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 3, 1959, the Chairman of the House Delegation of the United States Group of the North Atlantic Treaty Parliamentarians' Conference is authorized, until otherwise provided by law, to employ a clerk to be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives at a rate of basic compensation not to exceed $6,000 per annum.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield for a question.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us something about this proposed new employee? This salary of $6,000 is base; is it not?

Mr. FRIEDEL. That is correct.

Mr. GROSS. What would be the total salary?

Mr. FRIEDEL. About eleven thousand and some hundred dollars.

Mr. GROSS. What is the necessity for this clerk?

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS] to explain that, if I may.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to explain the matter to the gentleman. This organization consists of 200 members of the various parliaments of the 15 NATO countries who have been meeting for the past 4 years in Paris. This year they are meeting in Washington, and it is necessary to have someone to make the necessary numerous arrangements relative to a meeting place, translators, and so forth, to get this conference under way. The French have done this for 4 years and have spent a considerable amount of money on it. I might say that I have cleared this with the Speaker. We thought that it was fair that for this fifth conference—this will not be held necessarily once every 5 years here; it may not come here again for 10 years, but we felt that we ought to do our part in having this conference in the United States this fifth year.

Mr. GROSS. If the gentleman will yield further, where is this gentleman going to be parked? What provision is going to be made for office space?

Mr. HAYS. I have asked the Speaker to try to find me a room for him.

Mr. GROSS. That is what I thought. How has this NATO parliamentary conference been able to operate in the past without this $12,000-a-year employee?

Mr. HAYS. Because we have not had the meeting here in the past. I might say to the gentleman that I invited him to apply to be a delegate from his side to this conference and he would have learned something about it. But he did not want to do that. I hope the gentleman will reconsider.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman from Iowa is not interested in two or three junkets a year to foreign countries. That is all this organization amounts to. It is a junketing organization.

Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Am I privileged to offer an amendment to this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FRIEDEL] has the floor. If he does not yield for that purpose, the gentleman may not offer the amendment.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not yield for an amendment.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Is there any limitation upon the employment of this flunkey for this junketing organization? There is none, is there?

Mr. FRIEDEL. Yes; there is. Our committee studied this matter very thoroughly. It passed the subcommittee and the full committee by a unanimous vote. It was thoroughly gone into. We felt it was necessary.

Mr. GROSS. Under your resolution, what is the termination date for the services of this individual?

Mr. FRIEDEL. This is only for this Congress.

Mr. GROSS. That is not what the resolution says.

Mr. FRIEDEL. It is for the 86th Congress; it is not to continue after that.

Mr. GROSS. Under the gentleman's resolution, he may be continued on indefinitely; is that not true?

Mr. FRIEDEL. No; it is just for the 86th Congress.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. I may say to the gentleman that the way the resolution is written it would be at the discretion of the Chair. But I should like to point out also, since I have been chairman of this group, since its inception, there has not been a year that I have failed to return at least one-third or more of the money allocated for the expenses of the group. I hope the gentleman would trust my good judgment not to abuse this authority.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I should hope the gentleman would turn back some money, because he and his fellow junketeers have been using MATS for transportation. You have been using offices of the armed services, of one kind or another, to haul your group around Europe, to take care of your baggage, and so forth. I should think you would turn back some money.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution, and I think we ought to have a vote on it.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman withdraw his point of order for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Nothing can be done unless the gentleman from Iowa withdraws his point of order.

Mr. GROSS. I will withdraw it temporarily.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further consideration of this resolution be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. GROSS. I object. We will have a quorum then and there will be no vote on this thing. I have been through this process before.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman withdraw his point of order for a moment?

Mr. GROSS. No.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman knows I cannot control the entire House when I make that unanimous-consent request. The gentleman knows that I would not be a party to any effort of that nature. If the gentleman does not object, insofar as the statement by me might be observed by other Members, I hope that when we meet on Monday next nobody will make a point of order to establish a quorum to prevent the gentleman from getting a rollcall vote on the resolution and thereby compel the gentleman to get a constitutional quorum. That is all I can do.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I think it is fair that I should say that the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke to me about the fact that if any votes were to be had today they would go over to Monday. I agreed to that for reasons which seemed to be completely adequate. I might say to my friend from Iowa that I appreciate his attitude, but if I understand the situation as it exists at the moment, if he insists upon action being had at this time, of course it would be within the province of the majority leader to move that the House adjourn. The House would meet on Monday. Then, if anybody wanted to have a quorum call, which I certainly trust he would not, the gentleman could get his record vote. But if the House did adjourn over until Monday, if the thing which the gentleman fears were to come to pass by reason of the action of going over to Monday, there still would be available to anyone who wanted to exercise it the right to get a record vote.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman from Iowa has heard the gentleman from Massachusetts make the observation that he hopes nobody will make a point of order for the purpose of establishing a quorum. However, I shall move to adjourn the House if the gentleman insists; but on Monday next that will not apply. I would not feel then that my urging of all Members not to make a point of order to establish a quorum would be applicable, because the gentleman has given me nothing in response to my effort to cooperate with him to the fullest extent of his desire.

Mr. GROSS. I will go along with the gentleman just once more.

Mr. McCORMACK. Do not say "once more," just say the gentleman will go along.

Mr. GROSS. Just once more.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the majority leader tell me why the vote on this matter cannot go over, and move to postpone the vote on these things until Monday? The gentleman knows very well that you could not get a record vote on it today.

Mr. McCORMACK. Far be it from me to contradict the gentleman on parliamentary law, because I recognize his superior knowledge.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not care for that kind of insult, and I object. I object, Mr. Speaker. We cannot have that statement here and get away with it. When the gentleman gets onto that kind of language, he is through as far as I am concerned.

Mr. McCORMACK. If I have ruffled the gentleman, I am sorry. It is just a little jocular game.

I renew my unanimous-consent request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the further consideration of this resolution go over until Monday next?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 82) to provide funds for the expenses of the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by House Resolution 81, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 4, 1959, the expenses of conducting the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by H. Res. 81, Eighty-sixth Congress, incurred by the Committee on Banking and Currency, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $100,000, including expenditures for employment, travel, and subsistence of accountants, experts, investigators, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, on vouchers authorized by such committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman of such committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

With the following committee amendment:

On line 1, strike out "4" and insert "3."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 79) to provide funds for the expenses of the investigations and studies authorized by House Resolution 78, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 3, 1959, the expenses of conducting the investigations and studies pursuant to H. Res. 78, by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $75,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman of such committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia if not otherwise officially engaged.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 92) to provide funds for the Committee on the Judiciary, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 4, 1959, the expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by H. Res. 127 of the Eighty-sixth Congress, incurred by the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $200,000 including expenditures for the employment of experts, special counsel, clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, and all expenses necessary for travel and subsistence incurred by members and employees while engaged in the activities of the committee or any subcommittee thereof, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee signed by the chairman of such committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

With the following committee amendments:

On line 1, strike out "4" and insert "3."
On line 3, strike out "127" and insert "27."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. How does this compare with the appropriation of last year?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield so that I may answer the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, this is the same appropriation. The appropriation is in exactly the same amount as it was last year. I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on the Judiciary returned upwards of $10,000 of this appropriation.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 107) to provide funds for the expenses of the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by House Resolution 91, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 3, 1959, the expenses of the studies and investigations to be conducted pursuant to H. Res. 91 by the Committee on Public Works, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $125,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, and all expenses necessary for travel and subsistence incurred by members and employees while engaged in the activities of the committee or any subcommittee thereof, as the chairman deems necessary, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized and signed by the chairman of such committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The chairman, with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, is authorized and empowered to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any other departments or agencies of the Government.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 108) providing for the expenses of conducting studies and investigations authorized by rule XI (8) incurred by the Committee on Government Operations, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 4, 1959, the expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by rule XI(8) incurred by the Committee on Government Operations, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $640,000, including expenditures for employment of experts, special counsel, and clerical, stenographic and other assistants, which shall be available for expenses incurred by said committee or subcommittees within and without the continental limits of the United States, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official stenographers to committees may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, strike out "4" and insert "3."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. This is $640,000 for the Committee on Government Operations.

What was the total expenditure last year?

Mr. FRIEDEL. $1,175,000, of which they returned around $75,000.

Mr. GROSS. Is this just the first installment?

Mr. FRIEDEL. This is for the first session.

Mr. GROSS. Is that true of all of these resolutions?

Mr. FRIEDEL. No. Not all of them. Some are for 2 years, and others are for only 1 year.

Mr. GROSS. This is just the downpayment?

Mr. FRIEDEL. This is not a downpayment. They feel they need this money to continue their work. They have saved the Government over $124 million last year alone.

Mr. GROSS. I am delighted to hear that, but I would like to see the report. I do not doubt the gentleman's word, but I would like to see the ways by which all of this money was saved.

Mr. FRIEDEL. I have it all here.

Mr. GROSS. This is just a first payment?

Mr. FRIEDEL. This is for the first session.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. HAYS. There is a committee appointed by the proper people on both sides to hear these various committees and decide whether their requests are justified or not. This committee unanimously decided that this amount had been justified by the committee. If the gentleman from Iowa is an expert on this matter, probably he could prevail on his side to put him on the committee, and then he could make a first-hand decision about the matter. But if a committee comes in and shows that they need this money, we will give it to them, the gentleman from Iowa notwithstanding.

Mr. GROSS. I do not intend to apologize to the gentleman from Ohio for asking questions concerning these appropriations. I will probably ask some more. I am sure we can rely on all of the committees of Congress to give us the information we want, but it is the prerogative of Members of Congress to ask questions and that I intend to do, the gentleman from Ohio notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I present a resolution (H. Res. 126) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation and study authorized by H. Res. 101 of the Eighty-sixth Congress incurred by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $110,000, including expenditures for the employment of experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official stenographers to committees may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia unless otherwise officially engaged.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "That" insert "effective from January 3, 1959".

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON HOUSE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 131) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, in carrying out its duties during the Eighty-sixth Congress, the Committee on House Administration is authorized to incur such expenses (not in excess of $10,000) as its deems advisable. Such expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized and approved by such committee, and signed by the chairman thereof.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATIONS BY COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I present a privileged resolution (H. Res. 136) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 3, 1959, the expenses of the investigations and studies conducted pursuant to H. Res. 56, by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $125,000, including expenditures for employment of investigators, attorneys, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman of such committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND ASTRONAUTICS

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 139) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 3, 1959, the expenses of the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by H. Res. 133 incurred by the Committee on Science and Astronautics, acting as a whole or as a duly authorized subcommittee, not to exceed $300,000, including expenditures for employment, travel, and subsistence of attorneys, experts, and consultants (including personnel of the Library of Congress performing services on reimbursable detail) and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee or duly authoried subcommittee, signed by the chairman of such committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield gladly.

Mr. GROSS. Is this what was known last year as the Outer Space Committee?

Mr. FRIEDEL. Last year it was a temporary committee referred to as the Outer Space Committee. The official name was the Committee on Astronautics and Space Exploration. This year it is a permanent committee known as the Committee on Science and Astronautics.

Mr. GROSS. How much was appropriated last year?

Mr. FRIEDEL. The Outer Space Committee received $185,000 of which they returned $90,000.

Mr. GROSS. This is a pretty substantial jump, is it not—$300,000 as the first bite?

Mr. FRIEDEL. It is very substantial. This committee deals with a very involved subject, and we do not know how much they will need. Certainly if they do not need the money they can return it.

Mr. GROSS. Again, this is the first installment.

Mr. FRIEDEL. These are not installments. We do not know whether it is enough for all their activities.

Mr. GROSS. We certainly hope so.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. This is a new committee and, of course, its problems are new. It is blazing a trail. If we need the services of experts from the departments they should be available. It seems to me the committee could do a good job and return some of the money in this instance.

Mr. GROSS. Certainly we need to start blazing a trail now in the matter of the economy, I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana, and I hope the gentleman will do everything possible to hold down the expenditures of this committee instead of coming back here for another three, four, or five hundred thousand dollars later on.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 137) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 3, 1959, expenses of conducting the investigations authorized by section 18 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, incurred by the Committee on Un-American Activities, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $327,000, including expenditures for employment of such experts, special counsel, investigators, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, and which shall also be available for expenses incurred by said committee or subcommittees outside the continental limits of the United States, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by the chairman of the committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. That the official stenographers to committees may be used at all hearings, if not otherwise officially engaged.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the Chair indicated earlier that the manager of a bill in the House, in this instance the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FRIEDEL], may exercise his discretion as to the reason for yielding to another Member; is it correct that it is the gentleman's prerogative to inquire from the Member requesting that he yield, the purpose for which the Member makes the request? In other words, in the immediate case, the gentleman from Maryland has the right to predetermine the intent of those who wish him to yield. If to yield is for the purpose of offering an amendment to the pending bill, the gentleman may decline to yield for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has entire discretion as to whether he will yield or not and for any purpose.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman very briefly.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that again, as I have in the past, I find myself rising to vote "No" and making known my position with regard to my opposition to this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I want to congratulate some of the members of the Committee on Un-American Activities for their continual attempts to try to rectify and eliminate some of the evils that have been going on in this particular committee since its inception several years ago. I am sure it can be done. I say, without fear of disturbing the present chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities and without contradiction, that most of you who have served in the House over a long period of time will remember the day when this committee was chairmanned by former Congressman Parnell Thomas, by Congressman Martin Dies, and then by Congressman Rankin, of Mississippi. I came in during the days of Congressman Rankin's administration.

I say on behalf of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], the present chairman of the Un-American Activities Committee, that I remember the days in the history of the Committee on Un-American Activities that the said gentleman put up a fight against policies and procedures of former chairmen and administrations to clean this committee up and put it on a properly functioning basis; with its conduct and procedures such that it could and would carry on its hearings and investigations with a great deal more responsibility and fairness and free from witch hunts and smear, as has been the case in the past with many well-intentioned people.

That is the day I am looking for and I hope I will be a Member of Congress long enough to vote for and be able to support this resolution.

I thank the gentleman for the 2 minutes allowed me on this resolution.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIEDEL. For what purpose?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I was going to ask the gentleman to yield first to offer an amendment to reduce the amount of the appropriation to a more realistic figure, but I understand he does not wish to yield for that purpose.

Mr. FRIEDEL. That is correct.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. FRIEDEL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, may I say that I regret, of course, it is impossible to offer an amendment to somewhat reduce the amount of money that is being given to this committee. In the first place I would point out that the amount of money which it is receiving is in excess of the amount of money that is being given to the Committee on the Judiciary and to practically all the other standing committees of this House. However, in view of the fact this subject is foreclosed, there is no point in going into that in greater detail at this time.

May I say I agree heartily with the comments of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WIER]. I hope and believe that the proper test of the sentiments of this House and its willingness to try to see that the rights of individuals are protected in our country, as well as protecting our country from the Communist conspiracy, will come on the question of whether or not we successfully either revise the mandate of the committee as indicated by a Supreme Court decision or we are able to take such other action as will assure this House that a committee will proceed within the proper limitations of its constitutional functions. I have asked and will press the chairman of the Rules Committee for a hearing on one or all of the resolutions introduced on this vital matter.

I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE PUTNAM LETTER

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, back in the early formative days of this splendid young Republic, when the American patriots were attempting to throw off the yoke of oppression of the British Crown so that they could live and enjoy the freedom so much desired by free men, there was a young man from New England who achieved everlasting renown as a great patriot. He left his plow in midfield and took up arms against the oppressions of British autocracy. Every school child in America remembers this early American patriot as Israel Putnam.

Today America is threatened by a new form of autocracy, the United States Supreme Court. This body has set itself up as some kind of super-duper legislative body, ever encroaching more and more upon the duties and powers of the Congress set up as the legislative branch by the architects of the Constitution. During the past several years we have viewed with alarm the persistent increasing tendency of the Court to usurp the powers of the legislative branch of the Government.

This modern Court has in recent years and particularly within the last 5 years rendered decision after decision, which in the opinion of a substantial number of constitutional lawyers and jurists are in violation of the 10th amendment to the Constitution and inimical to the rights and powers of the States and to the liberties of the people.

One of the most notable and ill-conceived of these decisions is the notorious school integration case.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a descendant of that great early American patriot, Mr. Carleton Putnam, also a New Englander, has again challenged autocracy.

Mr. Putnam is no southerner. I repeat, he is a New Englander, a native of New York State, and a graduate of Princeton and Columbia Universities. Therefore, he cannot be charged with southern bias. In a purely objective manner, he has forcefully and logically exposed the fallacy of that decision in a very forthright open letter to the President of the United States. And thus has rendered a great service to his native and beloved United States in an effort to preserve this Republic which his ancestor contributed so much to found.

His letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., October 13, 1958.
The Honorable DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: A few days ago I was reading over Justice Frankfurter's opinion in the recent Little Rock case. Three sentences in it tempt me to write you this letter. I am a northerner, but I have spent a large part of my life as a business executive in the South. I have a law degree, but I am now engaged in historical writing. From this observation post I risk the presumption of a comment.

The sentences I wish to examine are these: "Local customs, however hardened by time, are not decreed in heaven. Habits and feelings they engender may be counteracted and moderated. Experience attests that such local habits and feeling will yield, gradually though this be, to law and education."

It is my personal conviction that the local customs in this case were hardened by time for a very good reason, and that while they may not, as Frankfurter says, have been decreed in heaven, they come closer to it than the current view of the Supreme Court. I was particularly puzzled by Frankfurter's remark that the Constitution is not the formulation of the merely personal views of the members of this Court. Five minutes before the Court's desegregation decision, the Constitution meant one thing; 5 minutes later, it meant something else. Only one thing intervened, namely, an expression of the personal views of the members of the Court.

It is not my purpose to dispute the point with which the greater part of Frankfurter's opinion is concerned. The law must be obeyed. But I think the original desegregation decision was wrong, that it ought to be reversed, and that meanwhile every legal means should be found, not to disobey it but to avoid it. Failing this, the situation should be corrected by constitutional amendment.

I cannot agree that this is a matter involving a few States as Frankfurter suggests. The picture in reality is of a Court, by one sudden edict, forcing upon the entire South a view, and a way of life, with which the great majority of the population are in complete disagreement. Although not from the legal, in fact from the practical, standpoint the North, which does not have the problem, is presuming to tell the South, which does have the problem, what to do.

To me there is a frightening arrogance in this performance. Neither the North, nor the Court, has any holy mandate inherent in the trend of the times or the progress of liberalism to reform society in the South. In the matter of schools, rights to equal education are inseparably bound up with rights to freedom of association and, in the South at least, may require that both be considered simultaneously. (In using the word "association" here, I mean the right to associate with whom you please, and the right not to associate with whom you please.) Moreover, am I not correct in my recollection that it was the social stigma of segregation and its effect upon the Negro's mind and heart to which the Court objected as much as to any other, and thus that the Court, in forcing the black man's right to equal education was actually determined to violate the white man's right to freedom of association?

In any case the crux of this issue would seem obvious; social status has to be earned. Or, to put it another way, equality of association has to be mutually agreed to and mutually desired. It cannot be achieved by legal fiat. Personally, I feel only affection for the Negro. But there are facts that have to be faced. Any man with two eyes in his head can observe a Negro settlement in the Congo, can study the pureblooded African in his native habitat as he exists when left on his own resources, can compare this settlement with London or Paris, and can draw his own conclusions regarding relative levels of character and intelligence—or that combination of character and intelligence which is civilization. Finally, he can inquire as to the number of pureblooded blacks who have made contributions to great literature or engineering or medicine or philosophy or abstract science. (I do not include singing or athletics as these are not primarily matters of character and intelligence.) Nor is there any validity to the argument that the Negro hasn't been given a chance. We were all in caves or trees originally. The progress which the pureblooded black has made when left to himself, with a minimum of white help or hindrance, genetically or otherwise, can be measured today in the Congo.

Lord Bryce, a distinguished and impartial foreign observer, presented the situation accurately in his "American Commonwealth" when he wrote in 1880:

"History is a record of the progress toward civilization of races originally barbarous. But that progress has in all cases been slow and gradual. Utterly dissimilar is the case of the African Negro, caught up in and whirled along with the swift movement of the American democracy. In it we have a singular juxtaposition of the most primitive and the most recent, the most rudimentary and the most highly developed, types of culture. A body of savages is violently carried across the ocean and set to work as slaves on the plantations of masters who are three or four thousand years in advance of them in mental capacity and moral force. * * * Suddenly, even more suddenly than they were torn from Africa, they find themselves, not only free, but made full citizens and active members of the most popular Government the world has seen, treated as fit to bear an equal part in ruling, not only themselves, but also their recent masters."

One does not telescope three or four thousand years into the 78 years since Bryce wrote. One may change the terms of the problem by mixed breeding, but if ever there was a matter that ought to be left to local option it would seem to be the decision as to when the mixture has produced an acceptable amalgam in the schools. And I see no reason for penalizing a locality that does not choose to mix.

I would emphatically support improvement of education in Negro schools, if and where it is inferior. Equality of opportunity and equality before the law, when not strained to cover other situations, are acceptable ideals because they provide the chance to earn and to progress—and consequently should be enforced by legal fiat as far as is humanly possible. But equality of association, which desegregation in Southern schools involves, pre-supposes a status which in the South the average Negro has not earned. To force it upon the Southern white will, I think, meet with as much opposition as the prohibition amendment encountered in the wet States.

Throughout this controversy there has been frequent mention of the equality of man as a broad social objective. No proposition in recent years has been clouded by more loose thinking. Not many of us would care to enter a poetry contest with Keats, nor play chess with the national champion, nor set our character beside Albert Schweitzer's. When we see the doctrine of equality contradicted everywhere around us in fact, it remains a mystery why so many of us continue to give it lip service in theory, and why we tolerate the vicious notion that status in any field need not be earned.

Pin down the man who uses the word "equality," and at once the evasions and qualifications begin. As I recall, you, yourself, in a recent statement used some phrase to the effect that men were equal in the sight of God. I would be interested to know where in the Bible you get your authority for this conception. There is doubtless authority in Scripture for the concept of potential equality in the sight of God—after earning that status, and with various further qualifications—but where is the authority for the sort of ipso facto equality suggested by your context? The whole idea contradicts the basic tenet of the Christian and Jewish religions that status is earned through righteousness and is not an automatic matter. What is true of religion and righteousness is just as true of achievement in other fields. And what is true among individuals is just as true of averages among races.

The confusion here is not unlike the confusion created by some leftwing writers between the doctrine of equality and the doctrine of Christian love. The command to love your neighbor is not a command either to consider your neighbor your equal, or yourself his equal: perhaps the purest example of great love without equality is the love between parent and child. In fact the equality doctrine as a whole, except when surrounded by a plethora of qualifications, is so untenable that it falls to pieces, at the slightest thoughtful examination.

Frankfurter closes his opinion with a quotation from Abraham Lincoln, to whom the Negro owes more than to any other man. I, too, would like to quote from Lincoln. At Charleston, Ill., in September 1858 in a debate with Douglas, Lincoln said:

"I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races: I am not nor ever have been in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor qualifying them to hold office * * *. I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will ever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together, there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I as much as any other man am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

The extent to which Lincoln would have modified these views today, or may have modified them before his death, is a moot question, but it is clear on its face that he would not have been in sympathy with the Supreme Court's decision on desegregation. Many historians have felt that when Lincoln died the South lost the best friend it had. This also may be moot, but again it seems clear that for 94 years—from the horrors of Reconstruction through the Supreme Court's desegregation decision—the North has been trying to force the black man down the white southerner's throat, and it is a miracle that relations between the races in the South have progressed as well as they have.

Perhaps the most discouraging spectacle is the spectacle of northern newspapers dwelling with pleasure upon the predicament of the southern parent who is forced to choose between desegregation and no school at all for his child. It does not seem to occur to these papers that this is the cruelest sort of blackmail; that the North is virtually putting a pistol at the head of the southern parent in a gesture which every northerner must contemplate with shame.

Indeed, there now seems little doubt that the Court's recent decision has set back the cause of the Negro in the South by a generation. He may force his way into white schools, but he will not force his way into white hearts nor earn the respect he seeks. What evolution was slowly and wisely achieving, revolution has now arrested, and the trail of bitterness will lead far.

Sincerely yours,

CARLETON PUTNAM.

A STITCH IN TIME FOR UNEMPLOYMENT AREAS

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I have just had the honor of introducing a bill which is similar to one introduced in this body the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], and in the other body by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois and some 40 other Members of that body, both Democrats and Republicans. Like theirs my bill is also a bill to establish an effective program to alleviate conditions of substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment in certain economically depressed areas.

In my judgment no legislation is more urgently needed in the country today because of the fact that unemployment continues to haunt many of our major areas and according to surveys which have appeared recently in the press even the most encouraging economists expect that a large measure of this unemployment will continue to be with us for many months to come. It is my hope that this legislation can be acted on quickly and can be passed into law and signed by the President of the United States.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of the bill which has been introduced in this body and in the other body that seriously disturbs me and that is the requirement in section 5(a) that a community which is suffering from between 6 to 9 percent of unemployment is required to endure that level of unemployment for a period of at least 18 months before becoming eligible for the assistance and relief provided for by the legislation. I have the honor to represent in this body the great industrial center of Schenectady, one of the really great industrial centers of the United States. Schenectady has been suffering from 6 percent unemployment for a period of nearly a year, and also suffered a similar level of unemployment for more than a year during the period from May 1954 to July of 1955. Under the terms of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], Schenectady could expect no relief under this legislation until December of 1959, although two other areas in my district, Gloversville and Johnstown with 13.7 percent and Amsterdam with 18 percent, would be eligible for relief in April 1959 and in March 1959.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the requirement that a level of 6 percent unemployment must continue for a full 18 months, especially when the overall economic level is rising, is unnecessarily restrictive. We all know that a stitch in time saves nine and that sometimes a person who delays too long in getting to the doctor will arrive too late for medical assistance to do much good. I am afraid that the same situation may exist with regard to current regional unemployment. If we arbitrarily require that a community suffering for a full year in these days from this high a level of unemployment must continue to suffer that high level of unemployment for another 6 months before relief can be made available, we may be creating even more severe conditions of economic distress which will be harder to correct than if aid had been applied more quickly.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, the bill I have introduced differs in one important respect from the bill submitted by my colleagues in that it provides that a community can qualify for assistance if it has suffered from at least 6 percent unemployment for a period of 12 months. Under my bill we can get the relief going more quickly, Mr. Speaker, to those areas of the country which need it, and we can be hopeful that the doctor will arrive before the patient has expired.

I urge my colleagues in this body and the other body and the distinguished members of the committees who will be considering this legislation to give this matter their earnest and favorable consideration.

FOOD FOR PEACE RESOLUTION: AMERICAN FARM PRODUCTION A FORCE FOR FREEDOM AND PEACE

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, in 1958 the American farmer again demonstrated his productive genius by harvesting one of the largest crops in our Nation's history despite severe acreage limitations. This bounteous production is the envy of a world in which two-thirds of the population is undernourished.

Clearly recognizing the potent role of food in a hungry world, Soviet Premier Khrushchev has called for a gigantic agricultural development program, including the cultivation of some 90 million acres of marginal virgin lands, in an attempt to put the Soviet Union ahead of America in the production of food. Ironically enough, our Secretary of Agriculture and many other Americans simultaneously bemoan our mountainous surpluses as the number one problem facing the American farmer.

It is my own strong conviction that, properly utilized, our agricultural abundance can be a blessing to us and to the world. Surplus food can be a great instrument to relate our spiritual heritage and moral precepts to a suffering mankind. Surely we do not want to hide the candle of compassion under our bushels of surplus food. Would we not better fulfill our role as a great democratic Nation by following the timeless advice:

> Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy.

PARADOX OF HUNGER AND ABUNDANCE

I feel strongly that the tragic paradox of abundance in a world of need stems largely from narrow vision. Instead of viewing our agricultural wealth as a positive tool of foreign policy, we have adopted the attitude that foreign food programs are merely a way—and a rather ineffective one at that—to siphon off agricultural surpluses. Let me quote from the President's budget message:

> Sales of farm commodities for foreign currencies under title I of this act (the Agricultural Development and Assistance Act) and donations of commodities for relief purposes under title II have provided a temporary method of coping with some of the continuing excess production of farm commodities.

Instead of congratulating the farmer for his industry and positive contribution to America's wealth and world influence the budget message complains that:

> The continuing heavy impact of agricultural programs on the budget is mainly the result of the continued high volume of agricultural production and our long established and now largely outmoded system of farm price supports. * * * The system provides production incentives that impede needed adjustments and encourages the production of surpluses which, in turn, result in increased Government outlays for commodity loans and purchases, and for storage and interest costs.

The pressing needs in many areas of the world and the lagging Western response has been described by many observers but never more pungently than by Comdr. Sir Robert Jackson in the October 1958 issue of Foreign Affairs. The author's wide experience as an administrator in underdeveloped areas gives his words a ring of urgency and authenticity:

> It is a heartbreaking experience to live with people who so clearly need assistance, and at the same time to know that the great mass of people in the West would respond immediately if they, too, could have the same first-hand knowledge. Here is a great tragedy in the failure of human communications, and increasingly clear evidence that our political institutions have so far shown themselves incapable of dealing effectively with one of the basic problems of our age.
> Must one be driven to believe that we have lost our sense of reality and that we can no longer recognize the obvious? Can we visualize only the inhuman outline of the hydrogen bomb, and not see the obvious needs of hundreds of millions of people all over the world who ask nothing more than that we should give them a hand in time so that they can become persons with a future and so help to evolve a better world?
> We talk mostly of these problems in international terms and in terms of national policies and governments. But never let us forget that the ultimate objective is the individual—the ordinary man and woman and child the world over—who asks only that we should preserve life and give hope for the future.
>
> As each day goes by, and still the West fails to respond, the attitude of governments and people in the less developed countries changes—perhaps imperceptibly, but it changes. At present, it seems to me, it is moving slowly, but as relentlessly as lava from a volcano, away from the West. If that process continues, the uncommitted areas will not long remain uncommitted and the doors of Asia and Africa will be closed to the West.
> In the last analysis, and when all is said, one is left with the belief that this problem will never be resolved until the majority of people in the West are ready to answer strongly and affirmatively when that most fundamental of all questions is asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Here is the test of our faith, of our conscience, of our innermost belief in the usefulness and purpose of our own lives. Today we still have the opportunity to act in a way which would do much to achieve peace and security for a large part of the world, and justify our own existence. Will we accept that challenge or will we prove once more that "where there is no vision the people perish"?

PUBLIC LAW 480 A GOOD BEGINNING

A beginning, and I think a significant beginning, has been made in the utilization of our farm abundance under the auspices of Public Law 480 which was passed by Congress in 1954 in spite of what amounted to cool opposition from the executive branch. Under this act, between 1954 and July 1, 1958, farm commodities worth $3,934,000,000 in terms of U.S. market prices were withdrawn from the Commodity Credit Corporation's storage bins and put into the hands of foreign peoples whose need was great. Of this amount, by the terms of title III, $622,000 in foodstuffs have been distributed by nonprofit American voluntary relief organizations and such intergovernmental organizations as UNICEF. Church groups of all denominations have vigorously participated in the program and have testified to its important contribution with great enthusiasm. Several years ago Monsignor Swanstrom of the Catholic Relief Services testified:

I have seen the surplus products of our midwestern farms relieving misery in the heart of Pakistan; I have seen our sharing of the bounty of America's produce bring smiles of friendship to the faces of those in southern Italy who, in despair, had been flirting with communism, and I have seen the incredibility with which these gifts from the people of America were first greeted in the Far East where the whole concept of aid to one's neighbor had not previously existed.

Rev. R. Norris Wilson, of the Church World Service of the National Council of the Churches of Christ had this to say:

There is, of course, no question as to the tremendous value of these surplus sharing programs, both to our people and to those receiving materials. There can be no more effective or certain way, certainly none, that is so inexpensive, for America to demonstrate her feeling of friendship for other nations of the world, no other way so perfectly for the people-to-people concept to be spread, no other way in which the unique American ethic of human brotherhood can be brought into understanding by other people.

These accomplishments of the last 4 years are commendable, but in respect to American resources, world needs, and the possible benefits to U.S. foreign policy, they are indeed embryonic. Despite efforts to hold down production, according to the President's economic report, by June 30, 1959, there will be a record carryover of 1.3 billion bushels of wheat, or more than 2 years domestic requirements. There will also be large stocks of corn, rice, cotton, tobacco, oils, fats, dairy products and other goods. Here are the instruments with which we can build a sound economic foreign policy to promote peace, stability and free institutions. Moreover, these building stones for world peace and economic well-being will be available in the years ahead. Technological advances will insure that agricultural production will continue to outrace projected population growth.

FOOD SURPLUSES AND AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

While proposals to broaden the use of our farm products overseas ought to be motivated in large measure by concern for our fellow man, they are also predicated on the conviction that so-called agricultural surpluses can be a most potent arm of our foreign policy. This is not wishful thinking, but a realistic projection based on actual experience to date.

In a careful review of our Public Law 480 operations following a world tour to study this program, Harvard Economist John H. Davis concluded that success of the law "testifies as to the challenge that exists for the future; to utilize surplus farm products as a positive force for promoting international peace and security." Dr. Davis concluded that:

The potential of Public Law 480 as a tool for implementing foreign policy objectives far exceeds that foreseen in 1954 when the act was passed. (Address before a joint meeting of the American Farm Economic Association and the Canadian Agricultural Society, Winnipeg, Canada, August 20, 1958.)

The overall impact of our Public Law 480 program with some exciting recommendations for further implementation was evaluated last spring by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, HUBERT HUMPHREY. In a challenging report entitled "Food and Fiber as a Force for Freedom," Senator HUMPHREY, who has led the way in this field, stated:

America's abundance of food and fiber is a tremendous asset in the world's struggle for peace and freedom. * * * Food is the common denominator of international life. * * * A breakthrough in the conquest of hunger could be more significant in the cold war than the conquest of outer space. * * * Bread, not guns, may well decide mankind's future destiny. Thanks to our farm people, the United States is in a far better position than Russia to lead the world toward the conquest of hunger and want. (Report to the Committee on Agriculture, U.S. Senate, April 21, 1958.)

After the adoption of Public Law 480, the United States regained the approximate proportion of world trade that it enjoyed in the late 1940's and which it had lost in 1952 and 1953. Without this program, the U.S. share of farm exports would have been considerably smaller over the past 4 years. Not only have we retained our share of the world market but through many of the programs operating under Public Law 480, we are developing future outlets. Market development is one of the stated aims of this legislation.

I must emphasize that although it has provisions to aid the needy, this is not an international giveaway program. The great bulk of products have been sold for foreign currencies which have been used quite profitably—measured in terms of a farsighted foreign policy—as loans for multilateral trade and economic development, for common defense, for market development, for the payment of U.S. obligations, for educational exchange, and for other important uses.

Furthermore, when one considers that Commodity Credit Corporation storage losses averaged nearly $20 million a year between 1954 and 1957, and that the average storage cost in 1957 stood at approximately a million dollars a day, the stated budget expenses for Public Law 480 are greatly reduced. By December 1957 the costs to the Commodity Credit Corporation until title I of Public Law 480 totaled $2,571 million. However, the estimated losses and storage costs which would have accrued on these supplies came to $2,332 million. Therefore the actual costs to the Commodity Credit Corporation under title I were only $239 million during the first 3 years of operations. When one considers the uses to which counterpart currencies were put, the costs actually are transformed into profits.

CONGRESSMAN POAGE CALLS FOR LONG-TERM FOOD CREDITS

As Congress reviews Public Law 480 during this session, I am hopeful that we will widen the horizon of this vital program. A long stride forward would be taken by enactment of H.R. 2420, introduced by a most able and courageous champion of agriculture and world peace, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE]. This measure would enhance the effectiveness of our foreign economic aid policy by assuring underdeveloped countries a stable supply of agricultural commodities for domestic consumption on long term credit during periods of economic development. I am introducing similar legislation which I believe is a valuable addition to Public Law 480. Typical of the nations which could profit greatly from such legislation are India, Pakistan, and Ghana. These countries provide challenging examples of friendly, free nations that are undergoing a period of rapid industrialization which is crucial for their national well-being, but which is putting an enormous strain on their economic resources. A painful shortage of food and disastrous price inflation are the natural concomitants of industrial payrolls in the developing countries. Indeed, unless the quantity of food can be increased, an expanding industrial payroll is a serious inflationary threat. Furthermore, available dollar exchange is required for capital investments rather than food and clothing if economic development is to move ahead.

If the United States intends to preserve the integrity of the free world we must provide these nations during their heroic struggle for betterment with necessary foodstuffs from our overflowing granaries so that we relieve some of the pressures on their own economies. This could be accomplished by legislation similar to the proposals by Mr. POAGE and myself. This legislation recognizes that we must assure the developing nations long term food supplies. They must be able to depend on such supplies rather than awaiting a year by year extension depending on the annual mood of Congress.

NEED FOR BOLD ADMINISTRATION

Other measures may be taken to broaden Public Law 480 and put it on a more permanent basis. Four years of experience have demonstrated, however, that no matter how sound a program, its degree of success bears a direct relationship to the vigor, boldness, and imagination of its administrators. While I do not wish to be unduly critical, there appears to be a hesitation, an overly cautious, reluctant approach, which has severely restrained the scope of this operation. The agricultural attaché can hardly be blamed for not seeking out new markets when he lacks positive direction from home. We need a vigorous and convinced leadership which will stimulate a spirit of adventure and a sense of dedication in all persons connected with the program.

Unfortunately, during the latter half of 1957, and during 1958, exports of farm products shipped under Public Law 480 dropped sharply. In fiscal 1958 total agricultural exports declined by 15 percent. In 1958, 30 percent of farm products were shipped under special programs, mostly under Public Law 480, as compared to 40 percent in 1957.

BARTER PROGRAM

The barter program under title III of Public Law 480 by which American farm products were bartered for strategic materials of a readily storable nature came to a virtual halt in May 1957. While the 85th Congress passed a law directing the Secretary of Agriculture to barter "to the maximum extent possible" the present rate of $55.6 million in barter contracts negotiated between January and June 1958, compares very unfavorably with the average 6-month rate of $145 million between mid-1954 and mid-1957. The administration's excuse that barter tends to replace cash sales did not hold up under committee questioning, and, in fact, there is evidence that the coupling of barter and cash sales tends to stimulate the latter.

In addition to bartering for strategic materials, the barter provisions of title III could also serve as a very effective and flexible foreign policy tool to relieve temporary economic pressures bearing on nations largely dependent on the output of one or two primary—mineral—products. These materials can be stored without loss, and quite cheaply, compared to the food products they replace. This is an area of international relations in which the U.S.S.R. continually outmaneuvers us, even though we have the means to compete with her readily available.

AMERICAN FOOD SURPLUS NEED NOT JEOPARDIZE OTHER FOOD EXPORTING NATIONS

There appears to be apprehension on the part of the administration, and particularly the State Department, that Public Law 480 will disrupt normal trade channels and antagonize other agricultural exporting nations such as Canada and Australia. Provisions of the law make this highly unlikely and no cases of such disruptions have been proven. There would appear to be considerable room left for expansion of agricultural exports outside normal trade channels. To allay the fears of these friendly nations and to extend to them the very real benefits of this program, I would suggest that we invite them to cooperate in a mutual food-for-peace project.

I urge our administration leaders to revise their myopic view of this extremely important program. Our agricultural surplus is not primarily a budgetary headache. Its most dangerous implication is the unfortunate image of an America wringing her hands over her food abundance in full view of a hungry, suffering mankind that is trying to find a way to secure bread without sacrificing freedom.

FOOD FOR PEACE RESOLUTION

This Congress, I believe, should express its urgent desire to resolve the paradox of want in the midst of abundance. We should accelerate our efforts to cancel out some of the surplus of empty stomachs in the world with the surplus of food.

Toward that end I offer a "food for peace" resolution. A similar resolution is being introduced in the other body by our distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Minnesota, Mr. HUMPHREY. Under unanimous consent, I include the resolution at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Whereas the abundance of food and fiber produced by the American farmer is the marvel of the world; and

Whereas most of the people of the world are undernourished; and

Whereas the American people historically have been concerned with the well-being of other peoples; and

Whereas in many nations of the free world vital economic development programs are retarded and political stability is threatened by an inadequate supply of food; and

Whereas the remarkable bounty of the free American farmer has resulted in accumulations of farm commodities for which there is insufficient domestic demand; and

Whereas the Congress seeks to reduce unnecessary expenditures, including, where possible, those for commodity storage and for foreign assistance; and

Whereas the Soviet bloc has publicly challenged the United States and her allies to economic competition in demonstrating before the world the viability of their respective economic systems: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that an agricultural abundance is one of America's greatest assets for raising living standards and promoting peace and stability in the free world; and that Congress favors action to resolve the paradox of American agricultural surpluses and world food needs by more fully utilizing the resources of the American farmer as an integral part of the United States' foreign assistance program.

SEC. 2. This concurrent resolution may be cited as the "Food for Peace Resolution."

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BREEDING] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise and make a few remarks relative to our surplus food. I have noted with pleasure the resolution which has been introduced today by my colleague, the Honorable GEORGE MCGOVERN, urging that Congress initiate action to resolve the problem of our great food surpluses and world food needs by utilizing the resources of the American farmer as an integral part of our foreign aid program. I, too, am introducing a similar resolution today.

The growing moral resurgence in America compels us to make a vigorous effort to find solutions to the economic distress of many friendly nations. We have in our own country a costly bounty which could be turned to our advantage and to that of the hungry peoples of the world. On November 18 of last year it was my pleasure to speak before the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers at Hutchinson, Kans., at which time I advocated that our surplus foods be sent abroad to raise the living standards of hungry nations and to scale down foreign aid costs in this country by substituting food for dollars. We are spending approximately $38 to $40 billion per year in an effort to stop the advance of communism, or to protect ourselves and our free world friends from the Communist threat. I think it is our solemn moral obligation and responsibility to find the right solution to this problem of surplus food. Divine Providence has bestowed upon us the resources and the knowledge to produce. It is the American way to produce more and better, and we will, of course, continue in that way. At the same time, it is shocking to know that in our own country many people go to bed at night hungry without having had enough to eat. It is sickening to the soul to know that throughout the world, the aged and young children, the innocent, lie down in poverty and die every day, the slow death of starvation. Surplus food? No, I refuse to call it surplus. How could it be surplus when countless thousands are dying because they do not have it. It is a result of ever-increasing production, and of our failure to meet and solve the problem of distribution. The world and its hungry people are a ready market for our food production. We have food which we cannot consume, and we will continue to have food in such quantity.

Throughout this world today, there are countless numbers of God's people who have not even a spoonful of food. If we do not solve this dilemma of the bulging granaries and the empty spoons, then frankly, I fear for us.

Mr. Speaker, I feel this resolution should be adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that an agricultural abundance is one of America's greatest assets for raising living standards and promoting peace and stability in the free world; and that Congress favors action to resolve the paradox of American agricultural surpluses and world food needs by more fully utilizing the resources of the American farmer as an integral part of the United States foreign assistance program and this resolution be cited as the "Food for Peace Resolution."

MILITARY CONSCRIPTION

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I appeared before the Armed Services Committee today to propose an extension of the draft for only 2 years rather than accept the administration's proposal for a 4-year extension.

Coincident to this bill I am introducing a concurrent resolution which calls for a 14-member joint committee which shall have a life of 18 months and shall conduct a full and complete investigation of, first, military conscription and reserve policies; second, possible alternatives to the military conscription system.

This joint committee is of paramount importance today for there are real questions as to the necessity of the draft and whether the present draft and reserve programs are the right kind to give us maximum security in an age of complex military technology.

Perhaps we are fooling ourselves into thinking we are aiding our national defense through the military conscription program. Perhaps our military procurement policies gives us quantity with the illusion of protection rather than quality with the reality of security.

I sincerely believe that by extending the draft for 2 years we are protecting ourselves, at the very least, according to the military theories presently accepted by the administration. However, by not extending the draft and reserve programs for 4 years we are showing that we will not continue a conscription policy unless we have facts which show that this is the only kind of system that will enable us to achieve maximum national security. By having a joint committee investigation thoroughly study for 18 months military procurement policies and alternatives we are showing that we are not willing to cover up what might have been our mistakes in the past and what could become our fatal blunders in the future.

TESTIMONY OF REPRESENTATIVE LEONARD G. WOLF, OF IOWA, BEFORE THE HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE ON THE QUESTION OF THE DRAFT, JANUARY 29, 1959

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am LEONARD WOLF, Congressman from the Second District of Iowa. I thank the chairman and the committee for the opportunity to appear before you in support of my amendment to H.R. 2260. My amendment, if enacted into law, will extend until July 1, 1961, the authority to induct persons under the Universal Military Training and Service Act. I am also introducing a concurrent resolution which will establish a joint congressional committee composed of seven Members of the Senate and seven Members of the House of Representatives who will undertake a full and complete investigation and study of (1) the operation of the Universal Military Training and Service Act, the reserve programs, and the programs of procurement of military personnel by the Armed Forces; and (2) the alternatives to the system of induction of civilians for military training and service as a method of maintaining the personnel strength requisite for national security. Now I should like to explain why a number of my colleagues and I question a blanket 4-year extension of the Universal Military Training and Service Act.

Seldom, if ever, has there been a time in our history when it was more important for us to be strong militarily and to have an impregnable defense posture. Not only is it important to the United States but it is important to the entire free world. It will also demonstrate to the Communist world that we are constantly improving our military position. We are certain that no Member of Congress disagrees with the importance and necessity of our being militarily strong. There is, however, apparent disagreement as to how we should achieve and promote a defense system which will deter any would-be aggressor while maintaining our basic freedoms. Because of this disagreement it is of paramount importance that we review, reinvestigate, and reconsider certain of the basic assumptions inherent in our present military system.

There is no phase of our Military Establishment which demands more general review and discussion than our military conscription system.

Many responsible military leaders feel that the maximum strength of the Armed Forces cannot be maintained without the pressure of a Selective Service System. Consequently, no hasty action should be taken which would immediately end the draft. But, on the other hand, we cannot afford, either politically, morally, militarily, or socially, a mere blanket 4-year extension of the draft which will freeze into our military system until 1963 the present inefficiencies which are so much a part of the system which has come to be universal only in its discriminations, effective only in the perpetuation of the untested premise that there are no other effective alternatives to attract men to the armed services. I firmly believe that some of the arguments against conscription are so sound and raise such important questions that in the interest of both national security for the United States and freedom of our citizens we are forced to reconsider the administration request for a 4-year extension. Rather, I suggest a 2-year extension, during which a joint committee will, hopefully, seek rational alternatives to the present conscription method.

1. One of the most telling points against our Selective Service System is an economic argument. At the present time, the Federal Government spends as much as $14,000 for the training of each draftee. The present high turnover of military personnel who are drafted constitute a great waste of the taxpayers' money, adds to our mounting cost of national defense, and exerts an inflationary pressure on our whole economy. When these men leave the armed services, not only do millions of the taxpayers' dollars leave the service with them, but the services are then faced with the task of beginning all over again with training green recruits. B. H. Liddell Hart, the British strategist and military historian, in his book "Defense of the West" argues that the cost of training conscripts and other costs caused by the rapid turnover of short-time soldiers are not exceeded by gains in military power and military security. He states "conscripts cannot be trained in 18 months or 2 years to the high grade of skill required for modern warfare for by the time they are trained to even an 'employment' level, so little of their period of service remains that their employment is bad economy." Furthermore, conscription "heavily handicaps the regulars and their effective utilization for a very large proportion of them are absorbed directly or indirectly into the training machine for conscripts, and in 'caretaker' jobs at home and overseas." Many of the tasks which are performed by draftees and those who become regulars through enlistment could very well be performed by civilians. For example, the Air Force put into practice a few years ago a project known as Project Native Son. The project called for the replacement of a military man by an indigenous civilian in those tasks which could be performed just as well by civilians. According to a report in "Aviation Week," September 6, 1954, the Air Force was able to relieve 43,000 military personnel for a new combat unit through the replacement of these men with only 31,000 civilian foreign nationals. Clearly, if such a program can be undertaken abroad and be successful, an even larger program using American citizens may profitably be undertaken in the United States. At the very least a study should be made of the possibility.

The Cordiner Report, prepared at the request of the President, points out that only approximately 3 out of 100 draftees reenlist after their 2-year term ends. Mr. Cordiner underscores Liddell Hart's view when he states that the advance in "modern war technology makes it almost impossible to train a specialist in 2 years." Mr. Cordiner also notes that these men, just at the moment they become useful, leave the service. This brings to mind two other important and enlightening statements presented in the Cordiner Report. Cordiner stated, after talking to hundreds of enlisted men, "I found antagonism and bitterness over the draft. They (the men) were checking off the days until they got out. We must devote 25 percent of our military effort to training men who do not stay. The trainers are discouraged. They resemble the poor teacher whose every class flunks." Furthermore, the accident rate is very high because of the inexperience of men who use and man intricate weapons. The Armed Forces themselves estimate that close to $5 billion worth of equipment has been rendered useless because of these inexperienced men, according to the Cordiner Report. It is no wonder that now men who enter the 6-month program are not given any inkling of the use of modern weapons for fear they will damage the equipment. This, of course, raises the question of the merit of a program or system which now prepares men for the kind of war that was fought in 1939.

The most obvious point made against military conscription is that it is based on compulsion and, therefore, is alien to American traditions because our society is based on the voluntary actions of free individuals. Yet we all recognize that during other great national emergencies democratic standards and ideals have had to be protected through the use of military conscription. This was accepted by our citizens during the Second World War because of the immediate necessity for mass armies and because conscription was universally applied. But under the present Selective Service System, more than one-half of the men in the eligible age group have, by a combination of circumstances and means, including deferment, been excused from any form of military service. A large part of the burden of conscription has fallen unfairly upon youths who for economic reasons are unable to obtain draft deferments. These men are those who cannot afford to attend college or who must postpone marriage and the raising of a family. It is indeed an unfortunate thing when society aids its young men through devious means to avoid their draft obligation. According to John Graham, in a study prepared for the Fund for the Republic, there are as many as 60 ways for a young man to fulfill his military obligation without actually serving his time in the draft. For example, in early 1957 the pool of draft age men was about 5 million, of whom 2.3 million were fathers who, consequently, are indefinitely deferred under draft regulations. Conscientious objectors are deferred; many professional athletes are disqualified because of physical handicaps; college students are deferred; scientists, for the most part, are deferred. By Executive order set forth in January 1956, men past 26 years of age are dropped to the bottom of the draft list. This has the effect of releasing these men from their military obligation. I am not arguing that these people should not be deferred. However, it is clear that the so-called universality of the system is nonexistent. Married students in college often have children to avoid going into the draft. Those who are unable to avoid the draft because of economic or social circumstances are the ones who must enter the Army at pay rates much lower than those prevailing in civilian life, thereby adding to their own economic burdens and delaying their own efforts to overcome their relatively low economic status. Prof. John Galbraith of Harvard has asserted that "the draft survives principally as a device by which we use compulsion to get young men to serve at less than the market rate of pay. We shift the cost of military service from the well-to-do taxpayer who benefits by lower taxes to the impecunious young draftee." We are willing to have quantity with the illusion of protection rather than quality with the reality of security. As Mr. Cordiner has pointed out in his now famous report, the modern military manpower problem reduced to its simplest terms is one of quality rather than quantity. It is not merely a matter of the total number of people on hand but is much more a matter of the competence, skill, and experience of these people. The military services are not able at present and under present circumstances to keep and challenge and develop the kinds of people needed for the period of time necessary for those people to make an effective contribution to the operation of the force."

There is an apparent lack of enthusiasm for the present Reserve forces program. This is clearly understandable. New weapons have altered radically our national military strategy, and in so doing they have reduced our need for masses of military manpower. Be it right or wrong—and this question may well be one which would have to be reevaluated along with a basic review of our military manpower policies—our national military strategy now assumes that a major war fought with weapons of mass destruction would be brought to a decision in a relatively short period of time. These weapons of mass destruction, delivered by long-range bombers and ballistics missiles, supposedly would render mass armies obsolete. And if mass armies will be obsolete in a future war, so will those Reserve arms from which our mass armies are built. One justification for large Reserve forces, a justification which figures in prominence in the establishment of the 6-month program, is that in case of another Korea the necessary forces could be mobilized quickly from the military Reserve. However, the development and adoption of small-yield nuclear weapons for tactical use have supposedly led the Department of Defense and the administration to conclude that even in limited war modern technology reduces the need for masses of men. Even if this is not true, can it be honestly said by anyone in the military that the 6-month program as it is presently constituted gives the enlisted man enough opportunity and training in the use of nuclear weapons so that he would be combat-ready in such a war? Do any of us have any illusions about a 6-month Reserve program or the Air Force 10-week training? Does anyone believe that these men are learning what must be learned about complex weapons and weapons systems which are necessary in either a tactical war or a total war? It would be impossible to teach these men in such a short time and have them of use to our national security. Here is an example of what I mean: Writing in the Nation, May 10, 1958, Eric Pearl, a veteran of the 6-month program, states: "I was to learn nothing more than how to turn a radio on and how to shut one off, turn it on, shut it off, on, off. It required simulation, dedication, and no skill. I couldn't help sharing the guilt of my superiors for having let me get away with all this; and as I used to sit and look about my classroom at the many B.A.'s, and M.A.'s and LL. B.'s who were turning on and shutting off their radios, or as I looked through the window at the even greater number who were policing the area outside I could not stop myself from thinking of what a waste of talent it all was."

After all, not much can be accomplished in 10 weeks, 6 months, or 2 years when one considers the bewildering complexities of modern military technology, especially when the men in the program, both teachers and trainees, have no interest or intention of staying in the service. As the great historian Walter Millis has stated, and as was underscored at these hearings a few days ago by General Curtis LeMay, "If we ever mobilized 37 infantry and armored divisions envisaged by the 1955 Reserve Act it seems most unlikely that we could transport or supply them over railways, through ports, and across beaches smouldering and radioactive from the nuclear fires. The ground soldier is thought of today primarily as an instrument for limited or brush fire wars; as such, he is scarcely any longer a ground soldier but must be air transportable, which limits his numbers severely. Military men now pretty generally believe that any major war will have to be fought to the end with whatever was ready at the beginnings—and that means combat-ready. If we should again be required to mobilize great masses of manpower, comparable to the 15 million men raised in 1941–45, most of them would have to be trained to complex technical skills not usually acquirable from the kind of training one gets in boot camp or in National Guard and Reserve units."

An argument which must be examined and met through extended study is the notion that the draft laws encourage enlistments in branches of services other than the Army. Although there are no clear answers to this as yet, I have certain comments about this. One might conjecture and feel reasonably safe in stating that those men who enlist in other services in order to avoid the draft will not reenlist after their 3-year period. We may find a clue for stating this in the fact that many college students enter ROTC in order to escape being enlisted men. However, at least 73 percent of those in ROTC programs quit the minute their compulsory tour of duty is up. This, in itself, is a shocking thing. Hundreds of boys who enter officer training programs are there for no other reason than they do not want to lead an enlisted man's life. Is this the way to develop dedicated, thoughtful and responsible military leaders? Just as some men enter ROTC programs to escape being enlisted men, so it is that other men enter 3-year enlisted programs and leave them after 3 years to escape Army service for 2 years. This is supported, for example, by the fact that only 8 percent of first term enlistees reenlisted in 1955. If this is true, the Army may well ask itself whether its contention is more sophistic than sound, for again, it is questionable whether 3-year enlistees are so much better than 2-year draftees, when you recognize that 3-year men aren't staying either. If it is not the case, then one of our basic reasons for continuing the draft is unsound.

Finally, there is the question of individual liberty which must be considered. In a democracy and especially in the United States, we try to protect as many voluntary actions on the part of the individual as is conceivably possible while guaranteeing a well-ordered and secure society. In the past, war has made it necessary to suspend, in part, the voluntary aspect of our society. We are still doing this in our draft system; not as a result of the pressures of war but because of what might be a fundamental fear in actually facing up to the weakness of our present military system. This kind of fear, I need not tell you, could lead to the ultimate decline of the entire free world. Furthermore, it should be made clear that each time we suspend a voluntary action of an individual or a group of individuals, without examining closely whether or not we have to suspend the voluntary action, we are destroying that which has made the American form of government unique among nations. To arguments of this kind can be added many others. For example, it can hardly be expected that men living in a free and voluntray society who are forced involuntarily into military life for a fixed period of time will, by and large, be deeply motivated to give their best efforts while they wear a uniform, especially when there is no apparent reason for their being in uniform, when the tasks they perform have no relation to modern warfare. As Maj. Gen. Harold R. Maddux, who directs the Defense Department's division of manpower requirements, said in May 1958, "* * * We need dramatic changes in pay and attitudes to upgrade a military career in the eyes of the Nation. We can't get that change with huge numbers of men compelled to serve against their will."

John Graham has pointed out, "uncertainties about the draft make it impossible for young men to plan ahead and, as a result, discourage them from getting the advanced training in the sciences or professions that the country is needing increasingly." The feeling of loss, of insecurity, and uselessness is compounded for thousands and thousands of young men who are already caught up with the bewildering and perplexing problems of adolescence and young adulthood. In brief, there are many political, economic, and strategic reasons for believing that our Nation's military manpower problems would be solved best by the abolition of conscription and by reliance on a highly trained, highly skilled, and well-paid Army. The Cordiner report has recommended some ways in which such an army might be brought into existence. This report, however, did not adequately consider the problem of attracting men into service through higher incentives. It did suggest that a complete analysis and investigation be undertaken for the increase in quantity and quality of housing for military men and their families. The committee also urged more study of fringe benefits which would play an important role in maintaining and attracting a high caliber of men who would stay in the service for a longer period than either 2 or 3 years. It should be noted that when Congress increased the fringe benefits for members already in the armed services in 1955–56 the reenlistment rate climbed 10 percent or almost twice the reenlistment level of the previous year. This certainly suggests that even more use of fringe benefits and incentives will attract and keep the kind of men necessary to protect the free world.

Clearly, the Cordiner report represents only a beginning of the studies which must be made before it is feasible to abolish conscription—as inefficient and inequitable as it may be. However, the Cordiner report shows that it is high time that we agree to reexamine all of the premises upon which our conscription method is based. Our greatest need with respect to national military manpower policy is a full-scale review of the problems, alternatives, and solutions which relate to this vital national security issue. This must be made lest we drift with the compounding errors and inequities of our conscription policies.

Consequently, I am suggesting in a concurrent resolution that it is the responsibility and policy of the Congress to use all means possible to better provide for the common defense through the modernization of our military system in a manner calculated to promote maximum freedom for the individual and greater national security for the society. It can best do this through the establishment of a joint congressional committee which will review our conscription methods and possible alternatives to it during the next 18 months. This committee, I hope, will be comprised of members of the great Armed Services Committee of the House and Senate, the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, members of the Science and Astronautics Committee of the House and Senate, and the Appropriations Committee of the House and Senate.

In conjunction with my proposed committee, I am asking that the present Selective Service and Reserve Forces Act be extended for only 2 years, during which time this committee will be able to delve deeply and comprehensively into the manifold problems of our present military system. Then after a thorough study of the recommendations of this committee we can decide on whether or not the draft is to be extended or whether there are better alternatives to it.

I thank this committee for the time given to me; and I thank especially the distinguished chairman, Mr. VINSON, for his help and understanding.

DRINKING ON AIRLINES

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the practice of serving alcoholic beverages, sometimes for free, to passengers on some flights of our major airlines is fraught with danger.

No major disaster has been traced to this as yet, but I do not believe we should wait for the inevitable tragedy to jolt us out of our complacency.

If a person wants to drink in his home, or in an establishment reserved for that purpose, that is his right under our laws. But when that freedom, and the unpredictable behavior that is sometimes occasioned by it, threatens the safety and possibly the lives of other people aboard an airplane in flight, it becomes a dangerous luxury that we cannot afford.

The most telling point in this controversy is that those who are responsible for the safety of the passengers, namely the airline pilots, stewards, and stewardesses, are opposed to this dangerous practice. The problem deserves our serious consideration.

In order to get both sides of the question, I recommend the article titled "Drinking on Airlines?" which appeared in the December 1958 issue of Together, the midmonth magazine for Methodist families. Although I am not a member of that denomination, I share their concern on this issue. Under unanimous consent, I bring this thoughtful article to your attention:

DRINKING ON AIRLINES?

(By Stuart G. Tipton, president, Air Transport Association of America)

Speed and safety are two dominating reasons for the rapid rise of airline travel. But a third also must be recognized: the airlines' responsiveness to the desires of its passengers.

The proposal to limit by law the serving of liquor on planes would mark a partial return to prohibition which was rejected by a solid majority of citizens in 1933 when the 18th amendment was repealed.

As a public-service industry, we have the responsibility to serve well not only the postal service and the national defense, but also the foreign and domestic commerce.

Backed by their traditional philosophy of service to passengers, airlines provide beverage service on some flights. In this, they are not unique in the transportation field for alcoholic beverages also are served on trains and steamships.

The same desire to serve the public motivates airlines to offer other services. Special meals are provided for diabetics or other passengers on restricted diets, to meet religious preferences; baby-food kits are on hand for traveling infants and cooked-to-order steaks for the gourmet. And for the sick, stretcher facilities are available.

Though the majority of passengers approve serving liquor, let us examine the objections of those who do not.

First are those either moral or religious in nature. We are well aware that consumption of alcoholic beverages is prohibited in the doctrines of a number of religious groups. We respect their beliefs. But, on the other hand, many other groups have neither religious nor moral objections to drinking. With these groups we also have no quarrel. Though protecting the individual's right to drink or not to drink, the airlines oppose any lack of morality which would result from excesses.

But these are all subjective views and are not basic in any consideration by Congress of whether alcoholic beverages should be served on aircraft.

All parties to this difference of view agree, I believe, that alcoholic beverages should not be served if such service is in any way a compromise with the safety of flight operations. We are convinced that it does not and there has been no evidence which has in any way changed our position or viewpoint.

Were safety at stake, the Federal agencies responsible for airline operations would not permit service of alcohol. Even more important, the airlines themselves, with their records and reputations for safe operations at stake, would be the first to reject liquor service if it posed any hazard.

In more than 20 years since U.S. airlines began serving alcoholic beverages, there has not been a single accident which has been traced to drinking on planes.

Why, then, is there a problem? It dates back to the summer of 1954 when the Air Line Pilots Association first questioned the service of alcoholic beverages on air carrier aircraft and later were supported by the Air Line Stewards and Stewardesses Association.

That summer, a letter from the pilots to the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB) set off an investigation which, according to the Board, "did not disclose any incident in which the serving of alcoholic beverages in air carrier operations might have jeopardized flight safety." Nor has a continuing investigation by the Board since disclosed any. Investigation and monitoring of the situation by the Civil Aeronautics Administration has disclosed none, either.

Then—on three occasions during 1954–55—the CAB asked the pilots to give it factual information, but got no answer. Yet, at the same time, the pilots issued public statements listing alleged incidents. On January 3, 1956, the Board sought facts from the pilots and again found no hazard involved.

Still again, in July 1957, the Board called upon the pilot and stewardess groups, along with the Air Transport Association, to cite flight-safety jeopardy incidents connected with service or consumption of liquor.

Ultimately, the pilots listed 34 incidents alleged to have a bearing on safety. Investigation of each showed that, of the incidents, in only six was liquor service aloft said to be a factor. Of the six, three were not reported to the airline; one couud not be traced due to insufficient data; one was obviously incorrect since the airline in question had never served liquor on domestic flights. The one remaining occurred on an international flight during which a passenger became difficult because he had consumed liquor before boarding the aircraft and concealed this from the airline's personnel.

In short, the CAB has carefully investigated every case cited to it—by the pilots and stewardesses—as well as by over 2,000 individuals. Not once has it found a relationship between liquor service and safety.

Actually, the matter of alcoholic-beverage service is one of airline regulation, and the U.S. domestic airlines that do serve liquor subscribe to a voluntary industry code. This limits passengers to two drinks and provides that service will be refused if the situation so requires.

I am familiar with the Methodist Church's stand on liquor, for I am a lifelong member and have served as lay leader and official board chairman of the Potomac Methodist Church. But the airlines must face up to facts as they are. Since repeal of the 18th amendment, liquor may be served legally in the United States. Since no safety hazard has ever been proved, we must discount this argument against the service of alcoholic beverages aboard aircraft.

Giving services desired by passengers is traditional with airlines. We, therefore, consider that a dignified and moderate alcoholic-beverage service, available to those who desire it, is in keeping with our philosophy.

PASSENGERS WHO DRINK CREATE UNNECESSARY RISK

(By Helen Chase, secretary, Air Line Stewards & Stewardesses Association)

We of the ALSSA believe no one should drink while a passenger on a commercial airliner.

I could speak as a Methodist—for I happen to be one—but instead I join this discussion as an officer of the organized stewardesses to present our viewpoint.

In recent years, alcoholic beverages have been offered, both free (cost covered in the purchase of the flight ticket), and for sale on airlines. Each year an increasing proportion of flights have become liquor flights. It is still true, however, that most flights are run without benefit of cocktails, and on those that do serve, there is usually a limit of two cocktails per passenger.

In this situation, as in past instances, we of ALSSA want to be fair with all parties involved. Therefore, we feel it is an accurate appraisal of the situation to say that, while this problem actually occurs only in a small minority of scheduled airline flights, it is still an important problem—one that deserves the attention of everyone concerned.

I have been a stewardess for 13 years. During recent years I have run into many situations that centered around the serving of liquor on airlines. Many of these incidents involved me personally; others happened to stewardess friends of mine.

For example, after drinking too much before and during one recent flight, a man decided, with the plane at 15,000 feet, that he wanted to enter the cockpit. He was a friendly enough chap, but he simply wasn't allowed in the cockpit under the rules of the Civil Aeronautics Board. Now, he didn't get into the cockpit, but he created quite a disturbance, and one of the three-man crew had to come back into the passenger cabin to quiet him down.

In another case a rather elderly gentleman, not himself due to his indulging, decided that this would be the time and the place (at midnight, somewhere over Long Island Sound) to give someone a goodnight kiss. He leaned over the seat in front of him and kissed its occupant. Both she and he were married—but not to each other.

These incidents sometimes have their humorous side, but for the most part they aren't funny. I personally have had passengers who, after drinking too much, have tampered with emergency exits (which can't be opened in flight, but which still should be left alone) and who have failed to observe "fasten seat belts" and "no smoking" signs.

On some airlines the more experienced stewardesses who have seniority to choose their flights often select trips on which liquor is not available.

There is definitely a safety aspect to this question. I believe, as do other members of the Air Line Stewards and Stewardess Association, that serving liquor in flight creates conditions under which incidents endangering the lives of passengers and crews could more readily occur. Passengers who imbibe bring a risk that is totally unnecessary.

I personally feel, however, that the greater disservice done to all concerned is the discomfort and annoyance to others brought about by such in-flight drinking.

While airlines have rules and regulations allowing them to refuse to admit to a flight one who obviously has been drinking too much, such detection is not always a simple matter. Then, too, the effect of altitude on a drinker can be an amazing one.

The way I understand it, the thing that makes one "drunk" is the numbing of reflexes and the slowing down of bodily functions, including breathing. This allows carbon dioxide to build up within the body, creating varying degrees of dizziness.

The condition is aggravated more in a high-flying airplane which, even though pressurized, allows the passenger slightly rarefied air and even less oxygen than he gets on the ground. Thus, one has a head start on intoxication when he is flying.

To put it another way, one drink in the air may be as potent as two on the ground.

PILOTS SHOULD NOT HAVE ADDED RESPONSIBILITIES

(By Clarence N. Sayen, president, Air Line Pilots Association, International)

The interest of airline pilots in legislation to curtail or abolish the serving of alcoholic beverages on aircraft in flight stems from three areas of concern:

1. The compromise with safety introduced by liquor served to passengers.

2. The additional burden imposed upon pilots who must bear the responsibility for the safe and honorable conduct of passengers while operating aircraft safely.

3. The assumption of responsibility for the maintenance of order and harmony, as well as safe conduct, among passengers permitted to consume alcoholic beverages.

When an aircraft leaves the ground it contains people of diverse backgrounds, experience, and habits. Some may have overcome apprehension about flying and be completely relaxed. Others may be under considerable nervous tension. Some may have a capacity for a considerable amount of alcohol with no ill effect. Others may react suddenly to small quantities.

There is no way of knowing what the reaction of any individual passenger will be prior to the beginning of the flight.

One of the greatest fears of all pilots is fire in flight. The careless use of cigarettes or matches by an inebriated passenger could start even a small fire which could create panic.

An apprehensive passenger, relieved of inhibitions by alcohol, could attempt to enter the cockpit. If he succeeded, he would interfere with the operation of the aircraft by the flight crew or possibly tamper with delicate instruments necessary to safe flight. Should an emergency occur, it could be tragic if stewardess or pilot had to contend with passengers whose judgment and alertness were dimmed by alcohol.

Operating an aircraft is a full-time task for the flight crew. But there have been instances where it has been necessary for the pilot to come out of the flight deck to subdue inebriated passengers. Had the pilot been injured, the flight would have been deprived of his services—and an emergency created.

Civil air regulations provide that a pilot shall not permit any person to be carried in an aircraft who is obviously under the influence of intoxicating liquor or drugs, except a medical patient under proper care or in case of an emergency. This places the responsibility on the pilot to refuse passage to individuals under the influence of alcohol. And for many years, we have carried out this responsibility.

But who can tell about the person who has had a cocktail or two before boarding? The first drink a stewardess innocently serves him could start a chain reaction of trouble and embarrassment, not only for her but for other passengers who, for the flight, are his involuntary associates.

Our association is skeptical that the pilot can effectively carry out all of his responsibilities if additional problems, created by serving liquor, are added to them.

Many foreign airlines have always served liquor aboard. When U.S. airlines adopted the practice on domestic flights, our association called these problems to the attention of the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Air Transport Association. We urged that the industry take voluntary action to terminate or regulate this practice. A competitive situation, we pointed out, was being created, under which airlines were being forced to serve liquor on board or to provide setups for people who brought their own.

The more than 15,000 members of the Air Line Pilots Association, International (AFL–CIO) have expressed concern for many years over the social, safety, and legal implications of airborne bars serving alcohol aloft. We strongly condemned it at our 13th convention in 1954. Subsequently, we asked Congress to act to regulate this problem after attempts at other methods of solving it failed.

We plan to continue to press for enactment of regulations which would provide a satisfactory solution.

STATEMENT BY MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend at this point a statement by the members of the House Committee on Public Works.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I include the following statement by Members of the House Committee on Public Works:

The labored reasoning in denying the award of a turbine contract to an English firm on alleged national security grounds is one of the new highs in political irresponsibility exhibited by the Eisenhower administration.

The prostitution of the country's trade policy for political reasons is bad enough, but as strong supporters of the development of a sound and constructive national water policy, we fear that the action of the administration is a further effort to sabotage the development of this program.

As a result of the administration's action, the Greer's Ferry Dam in Arkansas will cost approximately $300,000 more than necessary. This $300,000 could be put to constructive use, for instance, to plan some of the vitally needed flood control installations in the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio that might have averted some of the millions of dollars of damage being suffered in those States today. At a time when the administration is choking off water resources development under the guise of economy, this action in regard to the Greer's Ferry Dam is indefensible.

What makes the finding of defense essentiality by the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization more ridiculous is the fact that construction on the Greer's Ferry Dam would never have started if Congress had not written in an appropriation in 1957 over the objections of the Bureau of the Budget. Just 2 years ago the Eisenhower Administration told the Congress that this project was not worth constructing. Now it is telling the American people and our allies abroad that it is essential to our defense that the turbines in the dam not be built abroad regardless of the extra cost involved.

THE IMMORTAL VICTOR HERBERT

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, February 1, marks the 100th anniversary of the beloved American composer and great American, Victor Herbert. It is my understanding that the occasion will be appropriately celebrated by proclamations of mayors of principal cities, nationwide television and radio shows, articles in newspapers throughout the country, and other fitting observances. I desire to bring to the attention of the House on his great birthday the cherished significance of the life, brilliant career, and memorable contributions of this great American.

Victor Herbert was not only one of the most loved creators of musical works ever to appear on the American scene—he was also fittingly a courageous champion of the rights of his fellow composers to a just return for the public performance for profit of their compositions. Too often we tend to forget that the product of a creator's heart and brain, when made public in the form of a copyrighted work, belongs to the creator and is just as much his property as his house or his automobile. Use of his property for profit by others is deserving of compensation.

I am proud to say that in the United States of America, under our free-enterprise system, in general we respect composers' property rights, and that the U.S. Constitution guarantees every creator protection for his works over a term of years. The majority of the Nation's talented writers of music receive fees from the public performance of their compositions through the oldest and best known performing right society, the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers, which Victor Herbert founded in 1914, with the help of John Philip Sousa and other of his eminent contemporaries so very dear to the hearts of the American people.

Born in Dublin, Herbert journeyed to Germany as a small boy and there received his musical education. When he was 15, he chose music as his vocation and the cello as his solo instrument. It was as a cellist that he met his wife, the celebrated German soprano, Therese Foerster, and was hired by the Metropolitan Opera to come to the United States with her in 1886.

Herbert was not long in this country before he began establishing a reputation on his own—first as a cellist with some of our leading orchestras, then as an assistant conductor. For 4 years he was leader of the 22d Regiment Band before accepting a post as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

His years in Pittsburgh brought the orchestra there new stature and enhanced his own reputation as a musical interpreter. By 1904 he had established his own orchestra, which he led for many years in concerts in New York and other cities.

Leading his orchestra, Herbert became an important early recording artist for the Edison and Victor Cos. He was the first to function as an A. & R. man for the Edison organization.

Throughout this period of development in the performance of music, Herbert was composing a variety of musical works—a list that eventually included not only some of the most popular melodies of the 20th century, but more than 40 operettas, 2 grand operas, orchestral suites, chamber pieces, choral works, and recital pieces for piano, violin, cello, or the voice.

In 1916 he became the first man to compose an American musical score for a full-length motion picture, "The Fall of a Nation." He was working on an orchestral film overture at the time of his death.

As I have stated, Herbert was a leader in helping his fellow composers. Aware for some years that European copyright laws guaranteed a composer the right to payments whenever his works were performed for profit, he became a leader in this country in the fight to protect musical property from unauthorized use. In 1914, largely through his efforts, the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers was formed, and Herbert served as a director and vice president until his death 10 years later.

The amazing diversity of Victor Herbert's music accomplishments is little known largely because he is so very well known as the creator of some of the Nation's most popular melodies. Today, on the 100th anniversary of his birth, and 35 years after his death, he remains one of the most listened-to composers of all time. For scarcely an hour goes by without the performance of an immortal Herbert tune, somewhere: "I'm Falling in Love With Someone," "March of the Toys," "Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life," "A Kiss in the Dark," "Indian Summer" "Sweethearts." Without surrendering his professional standards, Herbert had above all the gift of writing music that would capture the sentiments—as well as the ears—of a great song-loving public.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, at the risk of some repetition, to elaborate on some major, but by no means all, great achievements in Victor Herbert's astonishingly brilliant musical and public career. I regret not to be able in the time available to me to cover more of the personal life, famous works, and public as well as musical interests and accomplishments.

There is no danger that Victor Herbert's best melodies will be forgotten by the American people. But there is always danger that Victor Herbert's full significance will fail to be realized at its true worth. As man and musician he rendered inestimable service to his adopted country, and our musical development would be far different from what it is had this genial Irishman not been among us.

Victor was born in Dublin on February 1, 1859, the grandson of Samuel Lover, celebrated Irish author, artist and songwriter, and son of Fanny Lover Herbert whose intense and sensitive nature was transmitted to her offspring. Edward Herbert, the boy's father, died when Victor was still a young child, and his widow was immediately concerned about the boy's training and education. It was fortunate that she married again, to a German physician practicing in Stuttgart, Germany. Here Victor grew to young manhood, studying the classics and developing his musical abilities which had revealed themselves when he was still a stripling. His chosen instrument was the violoncello, which he completely mastered, but he also studied composition and was on his way to success as a classical composer long before he ever dreamed of leaving Europe. His early songs, pieces, and suites reveal that rich vein of melody which later made him America's favorite theatrical composer.

Playing in the Stuttgart Court Orchestra he met Therese Foerster, leading soprano of the court opera, and wooed her while acting as her coach and accompanist. When she was offered a contract by the Metropolitan Opera Co. in New York she refused to come unless Victor, her new husband, came too. Consequently, in the early fall of 1886 young Mr. and Mrs. Herbert debarked in New York, full of anticipation for the future which would be as surprising as it was unpredictable.

Herbert immediately established himself as a man of energy, ambition, and independence. He was not long satisfied in being one of the cellists in the Metropolitan Orchestra. He quickly established himself as a teacher, he played in other ensembles, he became a leading spirit in the promotion of chamber music—then tragically rare in New York—he was a conducting protege of Anton Seidl, and he made his influence felt far and wide. No small part of this influence stemmed from the fact that he was the leading cello virtuoso of the day, the peer of any artist in Europe, and certainly the finest in the Western Hemisphere.

A man with Herbert's boundless energy, unique capacity for friendship, and highly developed technical skill could not long remain satisfied with any one job or activity. In 1893 he became the director of Gilmore's Band—officially known as the 22d Regiment Band of the New York National Guard. Herbert was intent upon bringing music and people together, and the band offered him an excellent opportunity. He quickly restored the band to its former prestige and made it the best organization of its kind in America. Its selection for and success in playing at the inauguration of President McKinley in 1897 emphasized the excellence that Herbert brought to this aspect of musicmaking.

Band directing, however, is still not the same thing as symphonic conducting. When the conductorship of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra fell vacant in 1898, Herbert was the successful candidate for the position, and for 6 years he distinguished himself as the director of a major symphony orchestra. Not only did he present excellent concerts in the steel city, but he closely rivaled Theodore Thomas in taking symphonic music to scores of communities eager for new artistic experiences. And in so doing he made his remarkable personality known to an ever-widening circle of friends and admirers.

But above all things Herbert was a composer. He possessed the vein of melody already referred to, and he had the skill to dress this melody in sumptuous romantic harmony and sparkling instrumentation. Realizing that the severities of the concert hall left little scope for bringing his music to the people he experimented in 1894 with an operetta, "Prince Ananias," the first of an incredible number of stage productions. While only reasonably successful it initiated his career as an operetta composer which has yet to be surpassed in terms of beauty, artistry, and long range popularity. His first stage masterpiece was the operetta entitled "The Serenade"—1897, followed quickly by two more splendid works, "The Fortune Teller"—1898, and "The Singing Girl"—1899. These productions made clear that a new and powerful musical force was making itself felt in America, and the critics hailed Herbert as the equal of the operetta masters of Europe.

Herbert's deserved success was not unnoticed by jealous enemies. Attacked and slandered in the pages of the old Musical Courier, Herbert fought back and vindicated himself in a way which benefited all composers subjected to similar ill treatment. When the courtroom battle was ended Herbert resumed his creative career, comfortably aware that he had vanquished the viciousness of tawdry journalism.

Early in the 20th century Herbert began to produce a bewildering series of operettas which confirmed the impression of earlier years. As he wrote score after score it was impossible that they all be equally meritorious; he wrote too fast for that. Fortunately we measure a great man's work by the best he achieves, not by his failures or indifferent successes.

The first great triumph of the new century was "Babes in Toyland," produced in 1903 and still a perennial favorite of the American people. What would musical Christmas today be without "The March of the Toys"? In 1905 "Mademoiselle Modiste" took the country by storm and Fritzi Scheff became Herbert's leading interpreter. This show was sprightly and sparkling, and the languorous "Kiss Me Again" has never lost its persuasive appeal. In 1906 "The Red Mill" began to exert its enchantment; and, after several less popular works, in 1910, "Naughty Marietta" brought new delight to a national audience. Perhaps the most beautiful of all American operettas, this work remains a high point of America's musical theater. It was richly scored, dramatic in concept and treatment, lavishly colorful, and highly imaginative. The mention of only a few of its excerpts brings fond and precious memories to mind: "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," "'Neath the Southern Moon," "I'm Falling in Love With Someone," "Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life." After this superb score, Herbert's subsequent masterpieces included "The Enchantress," 1911; "Sweethearts," 1913; "The Only Girl," 1914; "The Princess Pat," 1915; and "Eileen," 1917. Interspersed among these and following them were additional ambitious operettas which were almost, if not quite, their equal, the last one deserving special mention being "Orange Blossoms," 1922, with his last immortal melody, "A Kiss in the Dark."

It must be admitted that as Herbert grew older the style of American operetta was changing. The influence of ragtime and noisier, more raucous utterances were in the ascendancy. Herbert's spaciousness and dignity and Old World charm were not as much sought after as they had been. The beauty of his music was identified with a period, and the people who welcomed the newer styles had little patience with what the old master could offer. But the power of this old master resides in the fact that the music of his operettas, if not the productions themselves, is as eloquent today as ever.

Even this brief survey of Herbert's operetta career fails to cover his contribution to American music. He made two important attempts at grand opera. The first was "Natoma"—1911—an ambitious opera based upon the Spanish-Indian life of southern California early in the 19th century. When produced by the Chicago Opera Co. the leading singers were Mary Garden and John McCormack. It remained in the repertoire for 3 years and focused the attention of the country upon the problems of the American opera composer. While not permanently successful, its many pages of excellent music and its chronological importance keep it a landmark in the development of American musical drama. Herbert's second grand opera was "Madeleine"—1914—which was produced by the Metropolitan Opera Co. This was a one-act incident in the life of a French opera singer of the 18th century. Peculiarly enough Herbert here endeavored to write in a style which was neither natural to him nor appreciated by lovers of Italian bel canto. Its revival, if a suitable occasion could be found, would be interesting and worthwhile.

Important as Victor Herbert was as a composer his services to American music went much further. It should always be remembered that Herbert thought in terms of aiding his colleagues. He wanted composers to receive their just due; he wanted them to have a fair return for their efforts; he opposed the attempts of manufacturers and managers and proprietors to make money from music while the composer remained unpaid. The first opportunity for service in this direction came to Herbert in the early years of this century preceding the adoption of the copyright law of 1909. Campaigning vigorously and tirelessly Herbert, the composers' chief representative, succeeded in obtaining the clause giving musical creators a share in the royalties of phonograph recordings. The amount seemed small, only 2 cents a side, but it was more than the manufacturers wished to pay.

Without Herbert's great efforts in the struggle the composers might have gained nothing. It is also significant to note here that Herbert himself made no phonograph records until after his triumph was won. With the victory assured he and his celebrated concert orchestra began issuing a series of records which became enormously popular, first for Edison and later for Victor.

The next great opportunity for Herbert to serve his fellow composers occurred with the establishment of ASCAP—American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers—in 1913 and 1914. Although the copyright law extended certain exclusive rights to composers it provided no means for enforcement, and a concerted effort had to be made before the full effect of the law could materialize. Herbert and eight enlightened colleagues determined to found a society which would represent the composers struggling to obtain earnings which were—and are—rightfully theirs. Every composer of the present day who profits from performance of his music owes an enormous debt of gratitude to Herbert, the chief and most influential founder of ASCAP.

This triumph was not easily won. Proprietors who used music in their halls and restaurants were opposed to giving the composer a share of their profit. It took 3 years of litigation and finally the august Supreme Court of the United States, with Herbert always the key figure in the picture, to place American composers within reach of security and economic independence. Not that they became wealthy overnight—but they achieved a firm position of bargaining power and they found a means of asserting ownership of their own products which was impossible previously. And this they owed to Victor Herbert, the champion of composers' rights.

When Herbert died in New York on May 26, 1924, America lost one of her greatest sons. In addition to his innumerable triumphs as composer and artist he had made a host of friends who loved him dearly, and why not? He was one of the most lovable of men, jovial in his sociability, princely in his generosity, deeply sincere in his relations and activities. He brought happiness to the American people and he added a new meaning to musical integrity. He was enormously productive and he participated in many forms of musicmaking. His death was the occasion for front page headlines in practically every newspaper of the United States. In his passing the country seemed to realize that it had lost a great man, as indeed it had. A friend of Herbert's and one of the cofounders of ASCAP, Raymond Hubbell, remarked that the death of Herbert was like the disappearance of the sun. He was not the only one that felt this way, but the sun had only seemed to set. Its rays shine on in the warmth of Herbert's music, and his personality will be with us as long as we have the sensitivity to respond to his art and quicken to his name.

I fear it is hardly possible with these feeble words to appraise adequately the work and influence of the noble, gifted Irish-American, Victor Herbert. Passionate lover of and fighter for personal liberty and self-determination, composer of songs of inspiration, courage, and love, warm and loyal in his friendships, vital and vigorous in his work for many fine causes, sympathetic, robust, and warmhearted, few men in his own field have left deeper impress upon his times. Throughout recorded time his immortal melodies will ring down the unbroken channels of history, bringing sweetness, brightness, inspiration, and love to myriads yet unborn. The strains of "Thine Alone," and its kindred will live forever in the hearts of the people. The memory of Victor Herbert will live forever. May he continue to inspire us.

I am much indebted and very thankful to my friend, the distinguished author and writer and learned biographer of Victor Herbert, Dr. Edward W. Waters, for his valued advice and assistance.

SIMPLE SOLUTION FOR DEPRESSED AREAS

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I come from a depressed area down in southeastern Kentucky.

In September of last year the percentage of unemployed in the Middlesboro-Harlan area of my district was 16.2 percent. And in that same month the percentage of unemployed in the Corbin area down in my district at the junction of three counties was 12.8 percent.

Many House and Senate Members have these same unemployment problems in their own districts extending from California to the Carolinas and from Michigan down to Mississippi. Many of these depressed area Members have seen their unemployed people line up at the county courthouses to receive Government commodities and then carry them away in burlap bags on their backs for sustenance of their families in many humble homes throughout the land where these human pockets of underprivilege exist here in our great Nation.

Various other parts of the country are now enjoying a very pleasing prosperity at the exact time when depression area citizens are groping hopelessly amid the encircling gloom of substantial unemployment and real need. These conditions should not exist and both the Congress and the White House should be much concerned toward dissolving area depression and at the same time promoting prosperity in a more even consistency across the entire face of our land.

Quite a few remedies have been offered, but most of them involve, first, expenditure of much money; second, setting up of another Government bureaucracy; third, general procrastination; fourth, some untried experimentation; or, fifth, pulling of industry out of one place and putting it into another place.

My bill, H.R. 3696, just introduced, is a simple but effective approach to this entire problem.

My bill gives during a limited time a Federal income tax exemption as an incentive to any industry that is willing to open its doors and operate in a depression area while, first, employing an average of 200 persons; second, refraining from taking employment from one place to locate it in another place; and third, establishing itself where unemployment has been 10 percent or more for at least 6 months before the taxable year of claimed exemption.

My bill does not put more tax on anybody. My bill does not set up any added bureaucracy. My bill becomes effective now, when enacted, not next year. My bill follows the tried, proven path of tax exemption incentive, already shown to be effective in a Federal program of fast tax chargeoffs that caused numerous big companies to spend millions for plant expansion in these recent years. My bill does not take employees from one spot to put them in another spot, in other words, does not rob Peter to pay Paul.

My entire approach is so simple you are apt to look on it with some suspicion, but I hope your minds will be open to it.

My colleagues from unemployment areas, please study my bill and if you agree with me that it has some good possibility for solving one of the country's greatest problems of today, make this bill yours and help me dissolve depression and promote prosperity for the people of your own part of the Nation.

THE REVOLUTION IN MARITIME CARGO HANDLING

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, Government has an enormous stake, both financial and regulatory, in the various segments of our transportation industry. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance, in my opinion, that the Congress and the executive branch take an active interest in a new form of freight handling that links land and water transport into a single, integrated system.

This newly developing system can best be described as containerization. Already, because of its startling innovations, it is being hailed by experts as a revolution in transportation.

Now, it so happens that the first main utilization of containerization came in the port of Seattle, an area I have the privilege of representing. I, therefore, have had some opportunity to become acquainted firsthand with this new system of freight handling. To say the least, I am impressed by the tremendous potential benefits it offers to everyone who ships by a combination of land and water carriers. At the same time, I am seriously concerned by the many difficult problems which are bound to arise as this system evolves to maturity.

The nature of containerization is such that it encompasses the maritime industry, the railroads, and truckers. Traditionally, these are competing elements of our transport system. Now they have an opportunity, in serving the public interest, to coordinate their efforts to the end that a maximum load of merchandise can be started on its way at some inland point and, without reloading, be delivered on some far-distant shore or inland destination.

The full development of this new system confronts management and unions in all sections of the transportation industry with a wide range of challenging problems. More than that, Government is bound to be affected, as traditional patterns in freight handling by truckers, railroads and the merchant marine are drastically altered. To give meaning to these conclusions, and in the hope of provoking more concern both by the Congress and the executive branch with containerization, I would like to outline briefly some of the main features and problems that have come to my attention.

The idea of simplifying the task of transporting many small items by placing them in a container is not a new one. Its history is almost as old as civilization. As one writer on this subject recently said, Noah's ark was a primitive form of container. What is presently new in this idea is the use of a single container to be transported by a combination of land and ocean carriers direct from shipper to purchaser. This system, now known as "unitization" or "containerization," makes use of boxlike devices of varying capacity in which are packed an indefinite number of items whose only common characteristic may be a single destination.

Alaska Steamship Co., a line serving Seattle and Alaskan ports, was a pioneer in adapting the principle of containerization to oceangoing vessels. As far back as 1949 this company began experimenting with the use of simple wooden containers, called "cribs," in which merchandise was packed for delivery from shipper to consignee. The next major step came in 1953, when Alaska Steam made an arrangement with a truckline operator to provide for the use of vans in a combined one-rate through service to Alaskan interior points on a door-to-door imported basis.

The new system proved so successful that by November of 1958, Alaska Steam announced an enlarged van program. It called for modification of 3 ships, at considerable capital expenditure, to increase carrying capacity from 39 to 82 vans. The announcement went on to say: "Ocean, highway, and rail carriers here have combined to provide one of the first integrated services in the United States."

At present, the Alaska Steamship Co. provides through van service from shipper to consignee for southeastern and southwestern Alaska, including Kodiak Island. Vans for Anchorage and Fairbanks, moving by Alaska liners from Seattle, are handled piggyback on the Alaska Railroad from the port of Seward. At destination, delivery is made by Garrison Fast Freight or Alaska Railroad.

Alaska Steamship's success with containerization served to give impetus to similar operations by other water carriers. For example, Matson Navigation Co., a major west coast line serving Hawaii, has undertaken a long-range program which already has involved the conversion of 6 of their 15 C–3 freighters at an estimated cost of between $5 million and $6 million. Currently, they are handling containers on these freighters only on deck, but the company plans further conversion to permit handling the containers in the hold. One deck-van ship sails from San Francisco each week and another from Los Angeles. The six ships are estimated to provide something more than 100,000 measurement tons of van capacity per year.

On the east coast the outstanding container program is that of the Pan Atlantic Steamship Corp. Loading at the New York end takes place at Port Newark, N.J. I am informed that a ship can be loaded and discharged in 13 hours, compared to the usual 84 hours for a ship of similar size loaded and discharged in the conventional fashion.

Forty-two longshoremen are needed, compared to 126 men for traditional operations. The loading cost for a specific ship, as reported in the New York Times of November 23, 1958, was $1,528.80, or about one-twentieth of the $29,635.20 cost of loading and discharging a comparable ship by conventional means. The New York Times article describes the operation as follows:

> The trailers are loaded at shippers' plants throughout the country and hauled over the road by commercial trucklines to the parking lot of a Pan Atlantic terminal. There, longshore drivers take over and shift the trailer to shipside following carefully drawn loading plans.
> Once alongside, dockers open the clamps holding the trailer body to the chassis. Then, one of the ship's cranes grasps the body, hoists it aboard, lowers it into the hold, picks up an inbound trailer body, lifts it out of the hold, and lowers it to the waiting chassis. The pier workers fasten the clamps and the truck moves back to the parking lot where teamsters will pick it up for delivery to its destination.

Many other operations, utilizing varying forms of the container principle, such as lift-on lift-off vans, roll-on roll-off trucks, or boxlike devices, are rapidly developing in all sections of the maritime industry. The important point is that a tremendous and exciting transformation in handling cargo that moves by land and water is in full swing.

Some of the advantages of the new system have already been indicated in the reference to the Pan Atlantic operation. A more rounded picture of the benefits can easily be seen in the following quotation from the New York Times of last October 17:

> A trailer is loaded, for example, in Springfield, Mo. It travels by road to New York or San Francisco, sealed, virtually damage-proof and theftproof. By ship it goes to France or to Japan, eliminating warehousing, stacking, and sorting. Each ship takes on her cargo with a few hundred lifts, compared to 5,000 individual lifts by the old method.

From this graphic description a number of points are self-evident. Cargo loss claims are reduced to a minimum. Merchandise arrives clean and intact. Cargo handling costs at shipside, one of the main cost items, are substantially reduced. Most important, ship turnaround time in port, a major factor in freight rates, is trimmed to a fraction of that required under a conventional loading system.

From these few highlights it is clear that the full development of the containerization system represents a tremendous potential in promoting the full flow of commerce. Yet, it must also be recognized that containerization projects many knotty and troublesome problems.

Of great consequence, is the question of how the workers involved in this technological transformation—longshoremen, truckers, and others—will react. Certainly they are confronted by many difficult decisions. They face the unpleasant prospect of gradual loss of thousands of jobs. It is likewise clear that the demand may be made upon them for drastic revision of many historic working practices and conditions. These two considerations alone suggest a human problem of tremendous magnitude and one that is packed with explosive force.

Another labor issue is the danger of jurisdictional disputes as new operations bring about new work patterns. For example, and I refer to the description of the Pan Atlantic operation, who is to drive the trailer from terminal to shipside—teamster or longshoreman? Or, to select another possibility, who will handle the assembly of cargo into vans or other containers when it is performed at terminals close to the waterfront? Or, who is to operate and service the new equipment that will be required on the waterfront to handle vans and other large containers? Already, there are indications of competition for what looks like a shrinking number of jobs.

Many other technical problems are coming to the surface as containerization proceeds. For example, there is the question of standardizing vans and containers. At the moment, each carrier seems to be working up its own container without much reference to what other companies are doing. Matson vans are not the same as Alaska Steamship vans, and both are different from those used by Pan Atlantic. The railroads, which have been handling vans piggyback for much longer than the steamship companies, have their own specially designed containers.

In the regulatory field, freight rates are likely to be affected. For example, I am advised that Matson and Alaska Steam have filed special tariffs for cargo handled in vans. Already there has been one protest appearing in the papers and no doubt there are many others. James M. Hanley, president of the Rice Products Co., Inc., of San Francisco, asked the California Public Utilities Commission to investigate container freight rates. Apparently he is complaining that Matson Navigation Co. and Hawaiian Textron are giving special rates to some of his competitors. If the use of containers is at the discretion of the carrier, and carrier rates are less than rates for conventional haulage, it is obvious that discrimination may develop.

These problems, none of which appear susceptible to easy solution, have led me, as a member of the House Merchant Marine Committee, to conclude that the time is ripe for some sort of helping hand from Government. My conclusion has been reinforced by a recent discussion I had with Mr. Paul St. Sure, head of the Pacific Maritime Association, a west coast management group. In particular, Mr. St. Sure pointed to the difficult task of reconciling new operations with the established work force on the waterfront.

As I understand it, labor and management on east and west coasts are now negotiating over the issues raised by containerization. However, these negotiations are taking place separately and are likely to produce conflicting results. One unfortunate possibility, an old bugaboo of the merchant marine, is a succession of regional whipsawing, as unions or sections of management struggle for position. Another development, as indicated previously, is conflict over jurisdiction. Or, at the very least, it can be anticipated that a great deal of friction and confusion, even work stoppages, is in the offing.

The labor problem, taken together with other aspects of containerization, suggests to me that the public interest calls for some constructive assistance from Government. I am not one lightly to urge Government intervention, but there appears to be a compelling need for all elements in the transport industry affected by containerization to be brought together for common discussion and consultation. Possibly some guidelines, indicative of a national approach, can be agreed upon. Possibly a climate conducive to mature collective bargaining, as well as settlement of technical problems, can be promoted. Certainly it appears that here is a challenge for the appropriate executive agency.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, it is most fortunate that the newly appointed Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation, the Honorable John J. Allen, Jr., is a man with broad background in the merchant marine. For many years he served with distinction on the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, of which I am a member. I am confident Mr. Allen already has considerable knowledge on the subject of containerization, and is, therefore, well fitted to provide the necessary leadership in helping the various elements of the transportation industry to solve their problems.

I am aware that already much has been done by various agencies in the field of containerization. But I am convinced there has been hesitancy in tackling some of the practical problems I have indicated. I also feel, on the basis of my information, that there has been regrettable delay in recognizing the enormous implications for the public interest in the development of containerization. I trust and hope that the Department of Commerce, as well as other agencies, will speedily give weight to my opinions.

I likewise urge that my colleagues in the House give this subject earnest consideration in the future. In due course the Congress is bound to feel the impact of this rapidly evolving transportation system that makes the most efficient use of land and water carriers.

Mr. Speaker, in the past the very able chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has rendered great service to the American shipping industry by seeking information in the field of maritime practices. I know the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER] will be helpful if it appears that congressional action is needed.

Meanwhile, it is interesting to note that representatives of various segments of the shipping industry meeting in New York City recently seemed in agreement that use of giant containers could revolutionize shipping and even ships. Their decisions indicate it could mean the very survival of the American merchant marine.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT LEGISLATION

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I think everyone here is quite cognizant of the fact that labor legislation in this session of Congress is almost a must. I know that each and every Member has his own ideas about the type of legislation he would like to see enacted in this body.

There will probably be two major bills, perhaps three major bills, but I should like each Member of Congress, regardless of his party or his philosophy, to study these bills personally, to weigh them carefully, and then it is my hope that the Committee on Labor of the House and the Labor Committee in the other body will be able to bring to the floor of each body the kind of legislation that will benefit all the people of this country and will provide labor and management a fair solution of the problems that exist today.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that corruption and racketeering be kept out of labor-management relations. There is one proposal which would do this effectively without crippling labor or management. I am referring to the proposal which would carry out the recommendations contained in the President's labor message.

Mr. Speaker, we have been treated to shocking revelations by the investigations of the congressional committees into improper activities on the part of both labor and management. We have seen what can happen when employers and union officials who are supposed to be dealing at arm's length put their personal gain above the interests they represent.

Our whole legal system guaranteeing the rights of individual workers and safeguarding the public interest in the exercise of these rights is made a mockery when these individuals enter into collusion.

It is high time that we did something about this situation. None of us should countenance any delay, for the longer we delay action, the more flagrant the abuses will become.

The administration has provided us with the pattern of legislation that will eradicate the evils which have sprung up in labor relations. Union officials will think twice before they use union funds for personal convenience if they know that a full report of their actions will be available to each and every union member. Employers will pause before they attempt to undermine a union officer's obligations to union members by under-the-table bribes, if they realize that such transactions will be spread on the record for all to see.

The administration's proposals would require full reporting and disclosure of the activities of unions, union officials, employers, and labor consultants.

I strongly recommend that they be approved by Congress without delay.

EXPLANATION OF BILL FOR THE ENACTMENT OF THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT PRACTICES ACT OF 1959

This bill is designed to provide needed safeguards against improper practices in labor organizations and in labor-management relations. It would require the reporting and disclosure of the financial operations and administrative practices of labor organizations, certain financial transactions of their officers, and direct and indirect dealings between officers of such organizations and employers which may involve conflicts of interests. The bill, in general, would reinforce rights of members with respect to the proper administration and application of the funds and property of labor organizations, the election and removal of officers, and protect subordinate organizations and their members from abuses of the devices used to exercise supervisory control over their affairs. In addition, the bill provides certain needed adjustments in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, which will better protect certain employees, the public, and innocent third parties from the consequences of labor disputes, as well as provide improvements in representation procedures with respect to the construction industry to more adequately meet the needs of labor-management relations in that industry.

As recommended by the President:

All unions would be required to file annual reports with the Department of Labor with respect to their financial operations and to furnish such information to their members. In addition, unions would be required to file copies of their constitutions and bylaws along with detailed information with respect to their organization and procedures, including certification that prescribed minimum standards for the election and removal of officers are provided and being followed.

Information required to be reported under the act would be open to the public, and unions would be required to keep adequate records on matters to be reported which would be open to examination by Government representatives and, upon request, accessible to union members.

Unions, union officers and agents, and employers would be required to report and keep records regarding any payments or transactions, including those engaged in through employer intermediaries, which may create conflicts of interests or involve interference with the statutory collective bargaining and organizational rights of employees.

Union funds and property would be required to be held and administered for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes of the union and such duty would be enforceable in any court in a suit by, or in behalf of, its members.

All unions would be required to hold periodic elections of officers and to observe minimum standards for the conduct of elections, including the right of all members to vote, with due notice, by secret ballot without restraint or coercion, equal opportunity for all members to nominate and be candidates, and the provision of procedures and facilities to insure honest elections and the accurate tabulation of votes; the use of union or employer funds to promote any candidate for union office would be banned and union constitutions and bylaws would have to contain detailed statements of election procedures and compliance with such procedures would be required to be certified to by the principal executive officer.

All unions would be required to observe minimum standards, including conformity with applicable provisions of their constitutions and bylaws, in the exercise of supervisory control over the affairs of subordinate bodies, the exercise of such control to be limited to purposes of insuring democratic, honest, and responsible administration of the subordinate body and effectuating legitimate objectives of the labor organization.

The administration of this legislation would be placed in the Secretary of Labor and he would be provided with adequate authority to issue regulations, investigate, subpena witnesses and documents, hold hearings, issue decisions and orders—which would be subject to judicial review—requiring compliance and imposing sanctions for willful violations, and bring actions in the Federal courts for injunctions to compel compliance with the act.

The bill would provide criminal penalties or administrative sanctions of loss of tax exemption or the use of or access to procedures under Federal labor-management relations statutes for willful violations of the act; it would also prescribe criminal penalties for concealment or destruction of records required by the act to be kept, bribery between employers and employee representatives, embezzlement of union or certain trust funds, and false entry or destruction of union books and records.

Any present remedies that union members have under State or Federal laws, in addition to those provided in the bill, would be preserved.

The secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act would be strengthened and extended so as to cover direct coercion of secondary employers and inducements of individual employees to refuse to perform services with an object of forcing their employer to cease doing business with another person, and to include employers not otherwise covered by the act under the protections of the provisions; it would also be made clear that union activity is permitted against secondary employers performing "farmed out" struck work for the primary employer and, under certain circumstances, against secondary employers engaged in work at a common construction site with the primary employer.

It would be made an unfair labor practice, subject to mandatory injunction, for a union to picket in order to coerce an employer to recognize it as bargaining representative of his employees or such employees to accept or designate it where the employer has recognized another union in accordance with law; a representation election has been conducted within the preceding 12 months; it cannot be shown that there is a sufficient showing of interest on the part of the employees to be represented by such union; or picketing has continued for a long period of time without a representation election.

The National Labor Relations Board would be authorized to decline to assert jurisdiction over cases where it considers the effect on commerce is not substanenough to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction and State courts and agencies would be permitted to exercise jurisdiction over these cases.

The provision of the National Labor Relations Act which bars certain strikers from voting in a representation election, although their replacements may vote, would be eliminated and the voting eligibility of strikers, as well as others, would be left to the administration discretion of the Board; the Board also would be permitted to conduct representation elections without prior hearings where there is no substantial objection to such an election.

The Board would be authorized to certify building and construction trades unions as bargaining representatives without an election, under carefully considered specific conditions.

Employers, as well as unions, wishing to use the Board's procedures would be required to sign non-Communist affidavits, thus equalizing the burden of such affidavits; this requirement would be strengthened by providing that an affidavit found by a court to be false shall not constitute compliance and requiring that the affidavit relate to conduct during the 12-month period preceding its execution.

It would be made clear that parties to a valid collective bargaining agreement need not bargain during the life of the agreement unless they have provided for a reopening, or such reopening is mutually agreeable.

It would be required that the Board be bipartisan in composition by providing that no more than three members may be of the same political party and the President would be authorized to designate an acting General Counsel of the Board when vacancies occur in that office.

A summary discussion of the bill by title and section follows:

Section 1 of the bill provides a short title for the legislation, the "Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959."

Section 2 consists of the congressional findings and policy showing the relationship of the subject matter to the free flow of commerce and the national public interest in the activities of labor organizations and the employees they represent.

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

DEFINITIONS

Section 101: This section defines 14 terms used throughout the act, including "labor organization," "employer," "employee," "person," "commerce," "affecting commerce," and "supervisory control."

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

Section 102: This section provides that if any provision of the act is held to be invalid, the remainder of the act shall not be affected.

EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 103: The act becomes effective 60 days after the date of enactment, except that provisions authorizing the promulgation of regulations become effective immediately.

TITLE II—REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

GENERAL REQUIREMENTS

Section 201: This section obliges every person required to file reports or other documents with the Secretary of Labor under the act to file them in the manner required thereby, to maintain records necessary to explain and verify them, and to keep such records available for examination by the Secretary or his representative for at least 5 years.

REPORTING BY LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Section 202: This section requires every labor organization to file with the Secretary a copy of its constitution and bylaws and other basic documents along with a report, signed by its president—or other chief executive officer—and its secretary—or other chief records officer—containing detailed information, or references to the provisions of the governing documents containing such information, with respect to its major internal structure and procedures, including provisions for discipline or removal of officers or agents for breach of trust and provisions made for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence and appeal procedure in connection with disciplinary action against members. Any changes in the reported information must be shown by an amendment filed when the next annual financial report is due.

Each labor organization must also certify annually that its constitution and bylaws contain the provisions for election and removal of officers required under title III, but a period of 2 years or until the next constitutional convention—whichever is earlier—is allowed to enable unions to incorporate such provisions in their constitution and bylaws if they certify during this interim period as to their existing provisions and procedures.

In addition, every labor organization exercising or assuming supervisory control over a subordinate labor organization must make, within 30 days of such assumption or at the time of filing the report required by this section and semi-annually thereafter, a report certifying that the requirements of title III are being observed and showing the union under control, the date control was established, the reason for the control and its duration, the steps being taken to reestablish autonomy, and specified information respecting voting rights of members and finances of the supervised body.

Section 203: Every labor organization must also file with the Secretary an annual report with respect to its financial affairs and indicating the method by which this report is made available to its members. These reports must show, among other things, the assets and liabilities of the organization at the beginning and close of its last fiscal year and amounts paid as compensation and expense or other allowances for each officer, agent, and employee whose aggregate compensation and allowances for the year exceeded $10,000. They must also explain in detail, or by reference to other reports, all receipts by the organization of any of its officers or agents of anything of value other than payments allowed under section 302(c) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, from an employer having employees who are, or might be, represented by the labor organization, or from any person representing such an employer.

Section 204: This section requires every labor organization to make the information contained in its reports, and the records and data required to be kept, available to its members in the manner prescribed by the Secretary.

REPORTS OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT FINANCIAL DEALINGS

Section 205: This section requires every officer, agent or other representative of a labor organization to file reports with the Secretary with respect to all direct and indirect payments to or from employers having employees who are or might be organized or represented by the union or to or from persons representing any such employers—including transactions engaged in by a spouse or minor child. Also requires information on investments and business transactions so related to such an employer as to possibly involve conflicts of interest. If the officer, agent, or representative of the union derives direct or indirect benefit from any such transaction it must be reported even if the direct participant was some relative or other third person rather than the union officer himself. Payments allowable under section 302(c) of the LMRA, regular remuneration for service as an employee, purchases and sales in regular course of business at regular prices, and bona fide investments in traded securities not involving substantial interest need not be reported.

Section 206: Any employer who participated directly or indirectly in any transaction required to be reported by unions or their officers, agents or representatives under sections 203 or 205, or who paid employees or others for the performance of any acts whereby employees may be restrained, coerced or interfered with in the exercise of rights secured by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act or by the Railway Labor Act, must file a report with the Secretary. These reports will identify the persons, including intermediaries, involved in the transaction, explain the circumstances of the transaction, and specify the sums, property, or benefit involved.

REGULATIONS OR REPORTS, RECORDS, AND DISCLOSURE OF REPORTED INFORMATION

Section 207: This section requires that reports be filed within 90 days after the effective date of the act or the establishment of the reporting organization, and annually thereafter as prescribed by the Secretary.

Section 208: This section authorizes the Secretary to prescribe such standards for required reports, recordkeeping, and disclosure of information, as may be necessary to prevent circumvention or evasion of the act's provisions.

Section 209: The contents of reports and documents filed with the Secretary are made public information, and he is authorized to publish and use such information for statistical and research purposes. He is also authorized to prescribe regulations providing for the examination by the public of the information contained in the reports and documents, and to furnish copies of the documents filed with him upon payment of the cost of the service. Copies of reports required to be filed will be made available by the Secretary, or by the reporting person, to appropriate State agencies.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS AMENDED

Section 210: This section amends sections 9 (f) and (g) of the National Labor Relations Act to substitute compliance with the filing requirements of this act for the present requirements of these subsections. This compliance is made a prerequisite to use of the NLRB facilities by both labor organizations and employers.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF CERTAIN PERSONS

Section 211: Provides that union and company officers required to sign reports under the act shall be personally responsible for the filing, accuracy and completeness of the statements in the reports.

Section 212: Provides that nothing in title II shall relieve any person from complying with the provisions of any law affecting any labor organization unless such provisions would conflict with the provisions, or interfere with carrying out the objectives, of this act.

TITLE III—OBLIGATIONS TO MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

RESPONSIBILITIES OF PERSONS ENTRUSTED WITH FUNDS AND PROPERTY OF A LABOR ORGANIZATION

Section 301: This section imposes upon every officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization having any of the organization's money or property in his possession or custody by virtue of his position a duty to hold such money or property for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes of the organization and to handle it only in accordance with such duty and in a manner authorized by the organization's governing rules.

A right of action in any court of competent jurisdiction to obtain relief for disregard of such duty is conferred upon union members or principal officers. The applicability of other laws respecting the duties and responsibilities of union representatives is preserved.

OFFICERS AND THEIR ELECTION AND REMOVAL

Section 302: This section requires union constitutions and bylaws to state the qualifications and procedures for nomination, election, and removal of officers, which must conform to certain minimum standards. These include limitation of terms of office to not over 5 years for officers of internationals and 3 years for those of locals, and assurance of the right of any member to run for and hold office. Members must be given reasonable opportunity to nominate candidates and to participate in secret elections, and ballots and election records must be preserved for at least a year. Rights of a member under these provisions shall not be affected by a failure of an employer to pay dues checked-off. Union shall provide facilities and procedure to insure free, honest elections and accurate count of votes.

Unions are also required to have and follow procedures and standards insuring members the opportunity to remove elected officers from office by majority vote upon a showing that a substantial number of members desire a recall. Election of successors to recalled officers shall be held promptly and in accordance with required election standards.

The right to bring suit in any court of competent jurisdiction for enforcement of the provisions of this section or the election provisions contained in section 303 is conferred upon union members where the violations are not the subject of any pending action or proceeding brought by the Secretary under title IV. However, a grace period of 2 years or until the next constitutional convention is provided for unions which can make necessary changes only by a constitutional convention.

Section 303: Use of union or employer funds to promote the candidacy of any person in a union election is prohibited. It is also made unlawful for any person convicted of violations of this act to serve as an officer, agent or other representative of a union within 5 years of conviction, for any person to so serve while ineligible to vote because of a conviction for any crime, or for any union or union official having preventative power to permit any such ineligible person to serve.

SUPERVISORY CONTROL OF ONE LABOR ORGANIZATION BY ANOTHER

Section 304: Compliance with the provisions of this section is required of every labor organization assuming supervisory control over another. Such control shall be exercised only according to the governing rules of the labor organizations involved and to insure democratic, responsible, and honest administration of the subordinate body. The exercise of such supervisory control is limited to the period reasonably necessary for correction of evils. A presumption is created that a period of over 18 months is not reasonably necessary, but if rebutted, additional extension of supervisory control for not over 1 year may be approved. Limitations are imposed upon the union exercising supervisory control with respect to counting votes of delegates and transferring funds of the subordinate union.

EXERCISE OF RIGHTS BY LABOR ORGANIZATION MEMBERS

Section 305: This section prohibits disciplinary actions against union members for institution of actions or proceedings to enforce title III. It also preserves existing rights and remedies under union constitutions and bylaws and under State or Territorial law.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATION, ENFORCEMENT, AND PENALTIES

ADMINISTRATION

Section 401: This section states that the provisions of the act, other than amendments of existing statutes, are to be administered by the Secretary who is empowered to take action and prescribe procedures necessary to effectuate act. Secretary authorized to make expenditures and appoint personnel, including attorneys who may represent him in any litigation subject, however, to the direction and control of the Attorney General.

Section 402. Provides for a Commissioner of Labor Reports, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to perform such duties under this and other statutes as the Secretary may delegate to him.

Section 403: This section authorizes arrangements by the Secretary for cooperation and assistance from other governmental and State agencies and provides for referral of evidence of violations of this act or other Federal law to the Attorney General or other Federal enforcement agencies.

INVESTIGATION AND ENFORCEMENT

Section 404: The Secretary is authorized to investigate alleged violations of provisions of act or rules or regulations issued thereunder, to publish information with respect to violations, and to make such investigations with respect to the accuracy and completeness of required reports as may be necessary in the enforcement of the act. He is also authorized to receive and take action upon complaints of violations of the act, but complaints shall not be made public except with complainant's consent. The Secretary or his authorized representatives are given powers of entry, inspection, and interrogation, as well as to hold hearings and make findings of fact and decisions based on them.

This section further authorizes the Secretary to establish Union Procedures Examining Boards to inquire into certain cases under the act, to conduct necessary hearings, and to make findings, conclusions, and recommendations to the Secretary. The subpena power provided by the Federal Power Act is made applicable to the Secretary and his authorized representatives, including the Union Procedures Examining Boards, for the purposes of any inquiry under the act.

Section 405: The Secretary is authorized to bring actions to restrain or prevent violations of the reporting, union election and supervisory control provisions of the act and to compel compliance with the act and orders issued thereunder.

Section 406: This section confers jurisdiction on the U.S. district courts—and other appropriate Federal trial courts—of actions brought, under the act, by the Secretary or by union members.

Section 407: Under this section, service upon an officer or agent of a labor organization, in his capacity as such, shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

Section 408: This section directs the Secretary, upon determination that there is reasonable cause to believe that there has been a willful failure to file required reports or that any person has violated the election, removal, or supervisory control provisions, to institute administrative proceedings conforming to the Administrative Procedure Act. Violations of provisions relating to election and removal of officers and the exercise of supervisory control may be referred to either a hearing examiner or a Union Procedures Examining Board. The procedure of these proceedings is outlined.

A final order of the Secretary, made on the record of the proceedings, may direct necessary corrective action and impose sanctions for not over 5 years—unless the violation continues longer. These sanctions consist, in cases where an employer is found to have willfully refused to file a report, of loss of the right to exercise any right or privilege under any Federal labor-management relations statute. A union found to have willfully failed to file a report or to have violated the provisions relating to the election and removal of officers and the exercise of supervisory control over subordinate bodies may also be declared ineligible to exercise any right or privilege under any Federal labor relations law and/or to have the income tax exemption granted by section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code. Where the outcome of a union election is found to have been affected by violations of the election provisions of sections 302 and 303, the final order may void the election and direct another under such supervision as may be necessary.

The decisions and orders of the Secretary under this section shall be conclusive upon other Federal agencies with respect to withdrawal of Federal rights and privileges involved, but they are subject to judicial review and enforcement as provided in section 409. Upon notice that a proceeding under this section is pending, Federal agencies may hold in abeyance or take other appropriate action in matters which may be affected by the Secretary's order.

Section 409: This section provides for enforcement of the orders of the Secretary, and for review of these orders upon petition of aggrieved parties, by the U.S. courts of appeals in the same manner as NLRB orders are reviewed. The commencement of enforcement or review proceedings will not stay the Secretary's order.

PENALTIES

Section 410: Willful violations of reporting and disclosure provisions of the act or applicable regulations are punishable by fine up to $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both. A fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment of not more than 5 years, or both, may be imposed for willfully making false statements or failing to disclose material facts.

Section 411: A fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both, may be imposed for willful destruction of records or documents required to be kept.

Section 412: Embezzlement of the funds of a union or a trust in which it is interested, or false entries in or destruction of books and records of a union or such a trust with intent to defraud or mislead, are punishable by fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

Section 413: This section provides for a fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, for willful violations of provisions prohibiting use of funds to influence union elections and barring certain law violators as union officers—section 303—and of provisions protecting unions undergoing supervisory control—section 304(c).

Section 414: This section prohibits the offer, gift, solicitation, or acceptance, to or from each other, of payments in the nature of bribes by employers and their representatives and representatives of unions or trusts in which they are interested, with intent to influence actions—or to have actions influenced—as a representative of the union or trust or, in the case of an employer or his representative, with respect to labor-management relations of the employer. Violations are punishable by fine up to three times the amount involved or imprisonment for not more than 3 years, or both. Immunity would be provided from prosecution because of self-incriminating testimony given before courts and grand juries involving violations of these bribery provisions, except in the case of perjury or contempt arising from such testimony.

Section 415: This section amends section 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, to extend its coverage to payments, first, by any person acting in the interest of an employer—as well as by the employer himself—to unions having members employed in the same trade or class as the employees of such employer—as well as to unions representing his own employees; and, second, to any employee or group or committee of employees of the employer for the purpose of interfering with, restraining or coercing the exercise by other employees of the employer of their self-organization rights under Federal labor relations laws—except compensation for regular services. The receipt of any such payment is also made unlawful.

This section also amends subsection (c) of section 302 so as to add to the types of payments excepted from the prohibitions of the section those made by employers to jointly administered trust funds established for the purpose of defraying the costs of apprenticeship and training programs.

TITLE V—LABOR-MANGEMENT RELATIONS

Section 501: This section provides that not more than three members of the National Labor Relations Board shall be members of the same political party. In addition, it makes clear that when the office of the General Counsel of the Board becomes vacant the President may designate some other officer or employee to serve as acting general counsel during the vacancy.

Section 502: This section amends section 6 of the National Labor Relations Act to make clear that, first, the Board may by rule or otherwise decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute where, in its opinion, the effect on interstate commerce is "not sufficiently substantial" to warrant exercise of its jurisdiction; and second, State agencies and courts may assume jurisdiction over such disputes where assertion of jurisdiction is declined.

Section 503: This section extends the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act to, first, direct coercion of employers to cease, or agree to cease, doing business with another; second, inducement or encouragement of employees individually to refuse to perform services; and third, to include within the scope of the provisions secondary employers who do not come within the act's definition of "employer," such as railroads and municipalities. The section makes clear that those prohibitions do not extend to activities directed at secondary employers performing for a primary employer "farmed out" struck work or those engaged at a common construction site with another employer with whom a lawful labor dispute exists with respect to wages, hours, or other working conditions of employees working at that site.

Section 504: This section amends section 8(b) of the National Labor Relations Act to make it an unfair labor practice for a union to engage in, or threaten to engage in, organizational and recognition picketing where, first, the employer has recognized in accordance with the act any labor organization and a question concerning representation may not be raised under section 9(c) of the act, second, within the last preceding 12 months a valid election has been conducted, third, the union cannot establish the existence of sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having it represent them; or fourth, picketing has been engaged in for a reasonable period of time and an election under 9(c) has not been conducted. A savings provision makes it clear that this new provision is not intended to make lawful any activity which is otherwise an unfair labor practice under the act. The section further makes violations of the organizational and recognition picketing provisions subject to the mandatory injunction provided in section 10(l) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 505: This section amends section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act to make it clear that the collective bargaining requirements of section 8 do not require a party to a valid collective bargaining contract to bargain during the life of the contract with respect to any modification which would become effective before a reopening is permitted by the terms of the contract or by agreement of the parties.

Section 506: This section amends section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act to authorize the Board, upon joint petitions by an employer engaged in the construction industry and a labor organization acting in behalf of employees engaged in that industry asserting that the employer recognizes the union as a representative of his employees and has entered into a collective bargaining agreement with the union covering such employees, to certify such union as bargaining representative without an employee election if a collective bargaining relationship has existed between the employer and the union prior to the current agreement and if the Board finds no substantial challenge by the employees of the representative status of the union.

Section 507: This section removes the provision in section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act barring strikers who are not entitled to reinstatement from voting in representation elections.

Section 508: This section amends section 9(c)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act to permit the Board to conduct representation elections prior to hearings, where no substantial objection is made to such a proceeding.

Section 509: This section amends section 9(h) of the National Labor Relations Act to extend the non-Communist affidavit provisions to employers as well as unions, to require that affidavits relate to activities during the preceding 12-month period, rather than at time of execution of affidavit, and to require that they not have been found false by any court.

Section 510: This section saves acts performed prior to the effective date of this title against being treated as unfair labor practices under amendments to the National Labor Relations Act made by the title.

Section 511: This section provides that the effective date for amendments of existing law provided by this title shall be 60 days after date of enactment of the act.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that members of the Committee on Labor who desire to do so may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, the administration bill, entitled "the Labor Management Practices Act of 1959," which I join the Honorable CARROLL KEARNS, of Pennsylvania, in introducing, is tough enough to protect the union member and the general public from many of the abuses and racketeering practices disclosed in testimony before the McClellan committee. It is a practical, equitable, and inclusive approach to the complex problems in this field. It provides adequately for reporting and disclosure of the internal administration of union organizations. It requires reporting of financial transactions of labor unions and their officers and employees to prevent recurrence of the thefts of members' dues and welfare fund money.

The bill also provides standards for the periodic election of union officers so that leadership will truly represent the membership, and it requires reasonable procedures and safeguards against abuse of the trustee device, whereby unscrupulous union dictators have imposed their brand of leadership and control over the locals.

This program is not punitive, and honest labor leaders and employers have nothing to fear from its enactment. It will be welcomed by all fair minded parties in the field of labor management relations, by loyal union members, and especially by the large small business fraternity, both of which groups have been so heavily and tragically victimized.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that the House proceed at once to consider and enact labor reform legislation which is desperately needed. The recommendations contained in the President's labor message to Congress provide an excellent basis for consideration of this important subject.

In general, I believe the President's proposals provide a sound and practicable blueprint for action in the area of labor-management relations. His proposals are neither arbitrary nor punitive. They are designed to protect the interests of individual union members and the public.

Perhaps the ideal climate for good labor relations would be one in which the Government played no part. However, that is an ideal not likely to be soon realized, and, in the meantime, the Federal Government has a heavy responsibility to create and maintain a balance in this field which protects the interests of the public as well as labor and management.

I do not necessarily subscribe to, or agree with, every paragraph and every clause of the administration's bill, which I have been pleased to join in introducing today. Indeed, I have serious reservations as to the wisdom or necessity of one provision which would extend the non-Communist affidavit requirements to all employers.

However, in general, the proposals of the President provide language which is an excellent starting point for legislative action. The administration bill is much better and more effective than the so-called Kennedy labor bill recently introduced in the other body. Among the major differences between the two bills are the following:

First. The administration proposal deals with the problem of secondary boycotts, and the Kennedy bill does not.

Second. The administration bill deals with the problem of blackmail organizational picketing, and the Kennedy bill does not.

Third. The administration bill imposes upon union officers a higher degree of responsibility for the funds entrusted to them by union members.

I sincerely urge my colleagues in the House carefully to study the administration bill and to get behind its objectives without delay.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe the administration's labor-management proposals are comprehensive and effective, and yet not oppressive to those who conduct their affairs in a fair and honest manner. Certainly, the vast majority of trade-union leaders have nothing to fear from this legislation, and I hope they will join in supporting it.

The bill, which a number of us are introducing today, is strengthened by provisions regulating trusteeships and union elections. The rank-and-file union member will be freed from the danger of having his local thrown into trusteeship by those seeking to wield unscrupulous power over the members they are supposed to serve and to have a free hand in raiding the union's treasury. The bill's provisions concerning secondary boycotts and improper organization and recognition picketing are also greatly needed.

Naturally, this bill will not satisfy everyone in all particulars. I personally have reservations about section 509, which extends to employers the necessity of filing non-Communist affidavits.

Nonetheless, the need for legislation to curb the power of the "freebooter" in the labor movement is too urgent to go unheeded. I am confident Congress will not again abdicate its responsibility by failing to enact the reforms this bill would provide.

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my wholehearted support to the bill introduced by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEARNS], to carry out the program outlined in the President's labor message and I am proud to join him as a co-introducer of this bill which embodies the President's recommendation on this vital subject.

All of us realize that immediate legislation fair to labor, fair to management, and most important, fair to the American public, is vitally and urgently needed. But more than immediate action on legislation is necessary; it must be effective legislation designed to deal with the problems and the abuses that have been disclosed. The answer cannot be a law simply requiring that conscientious and law abiding labor leaders and businessmen fill out more complicated Government forms to further overburden Government files and personnel.

There seems to be general agreement that there should be legislation requiring disclosure of financial transactions, election safeguards, and democratic procedures in unions.

At a time when the world is scrutinizing not only what American leadership, but what the American way of life has to offer, the living skeletons in our labor management closet cannot remain hidden behind closed doors. The administration's proposal would, without Government domination of labor organizations or labor management affairs, afford means to insure that the individual rank-and-file member of the labor organization will have all the facts and methods to clean out and keep these closets clean. I have as much faith in the success of this approach as I do in our system of Government which to me is essentially the same. I urge this body to most seriously consider this bill.

I do not subscribe to the sleight-of-hand majority leadership approach as indicated in the other body to date as being the opposition party's strategy of considering some labor reforms or racketeering in one bill and other equally needed labor reforms in another. It is an obvious effort to ignore and shunt aside with a lick and a promise such vital other labor reforms as outlawing blackmail picketing and secondary boycotts, making union funds trust funds free from improper uses, and clarifying the no man's land jurisdictional issue, retaining unto the States powers not specifically covered by Federal law.

These areas must get consideration this session, and in my opinion, the only chance for their serious consideration is as a part of an overall labor reform bill and it is obvious that many of the majority members who are responsive to labor leader wishes and do not want these equally needed labor reforms passed realize it too—as is demonstrated by their support of the majority sleight-of-hand strategy.

Mr. BOSCH. Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support the Labor Management Practices Act of 1959 which embodies the administration's labor-management proposals. I recommend adoption of these proposals because they provide an effective procedure for dealing with abuses which have been uncovered.

Among other things, the administration's bill provides for much needed adjustments in our basic labor-management relations law. I am particularly impressed with the corrective amendments to the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The loopholes in that act which permit direct threats and coercion of secondary employers are closed. In addition, employers may no longer be forced to agree to "hot cargo" clauses, through such threats and coercion.

The provisions are further strengthened by protecting individual employees of secondary employers from union inducement to commit a secondary boycott. These corrections insure that the really innocent third party in a labor dispute is more adequately protected. The secondary boycott has been a much abused weapon of the Teamsters Union in forcing small employers to accede to the union's demands. This bill will effectively eliminate this tactic from the arsenal of corrupt unions.

I should like further to point out that it is not necessary to consider labor reform legislation merely in its application to racketeering as compared to proposed amendments to Taft-Hartley. The provisions of the administration's bill which I have introduced today are, in my opinion, absolutely necessary in any legislation dealing with the abuses so forcefuly brought out in the course of the McClellan hearings in the other body. Let us not waste time arguing about amendments to Taft-Hartley as being the subject of different legislation. I believe that if we are really sincere in wanting to have true antiracketeering legislation, this is the bill.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I believe that one of the most important provisions in this bill is the provision which would outlaw blackmail picketing. There is no practice more reprehensible than the practice, widely adopted by some unions, of forcing unwilling employees to become members by coercing their employers to force them to join.

The effect of this provision is to make it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to coerce, or attempt to coerce, an employer to recognize or bargain with it as the bargaining representative of his employees, or such employees to select or accept it as their bargaining representative, first, where the employer has recognized in accordance with the NLRB another labor organization, and a question of representation may not appropriately be raised under the act; second, where the employees have determined in an NLRB election that they do not wish to be represented by the labor organization; or third, where it is otherwise clear that the employees do not desire to be represented by the labor organization.

While decisions of the NLRB in Curtis Bros. and related cases indicate that picketing in the circumstances described above would presently be an unfair labor practice, these Board decisions have not been followed by some courts and consequently this area is shrouded in uncertainty.

This proposal makes it clear that a union may not picket or use other coercive tactics against an employer to force him to bargain with it while the employer is lawfully recognizing another union. It also protects the employer and his employees from harassment where an election under NLRB provisions has resulted in a "no union" certification or there are other factors which clearly indicate that the union is unwanted as the bargaining representative.

The union practice of disclaiming the right to represent an employer's employees and so avoiding an election while continuing to picket the employer can only be designed to force the employer to recognize the union against the wishes of the employees by causing him economic hardship and should be stopped. The provisions of this bill would remove any doubt as to the status of such picketing by declaring it an unfair labor practice.

USE OF AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES IN FOOD FOR PEACE PROGRAM

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased that the President in his farm message has emphasized the use of our agricultural surpluses in a food for peace program. The President indicates in his message that he is setting steps in motion to explore anew with other surplus-producing nations all practical means of using our surplus agricultural commodities in promoting the well-being of friendly peoples in the world and in reinforcing the cause of peace.

It is a strange paradox that we in America must struggle with the problems involving agricultural surpluses while many of our friendly neighbors throughout the world do not have sufficient food to meet daily nutritional requirements. As the President has pointed out in his message, during the past 4 years our special export programs have already provided friendly food-deficit nations with over $4 billion worth of products which we have in abundance. None of us can sincerely doubt that food can be a powerful instrument in the world for building a durable peace.

I feel that it would be beneficial for the Congress to immediately express its approval of the President's food for peace suggestion in his farm message just presented, and I am therefore today introducing the following resolution declaring it to be the sense of the Congress to afford the fullest cooperation in achieving all practical means of implementing the President's food for peace program:

JOINT RESOLUTION TO PERMIT THE USE OF FOOD FOR PEACE

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Congress hereby concurs in the views of the President to the effect that food can be a powerful instrument for all the free world in building a durable peace, and that the United States and other surplus-producing nations should make the fullest constructive use of their abundance of agricultural products to this end.

SEC. 2. The President is hereby directed to review existing authorizations with respect to the disposal of agricultural commodities and products thereof, to utilize such authority to the fullest extent practicable in the interests of reinforcing peace and the well-being of friendly peoples throughout the world, and to report to the Congress such additional authorizations as he may consider desirable to achieve such purposes.

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I join the remarks of my colleague in commending the President on his message to Congress on agriculture.

The facts and figures contained in the President's message concerning former agriculture programs enacted by Congress in recent years clearly shows the weaknesses in that program. I think it fair to state that the President and Secretary Benson have previously submitted recommendations indicating equal concern over the farm program—but Congress has utterly failed to measure up to the challenge and provide the Executive with a workable program—a program that will have the overall eventual effect of decreasing the cost of the farm program, decrease the surpluses, increase farmer incentive which is essential under our free enterprise system, and reduce to a minimum governmental control over the farmer.

I suggest to this Congress that the people of this Nation have a right to and are in fact looking to this body for a program that will accomplish the President's announced objectives. It accomplishes nothing in meeting this problem for the majority Members who have the primary responsibility in providing a program to accept that responsibility only with criticism of the Executive—when in reality the Executive is only carrying out the program provided by this body.

With storage of surpluses costing the taxpayer—who not only suffers as a taxpayer, but also as a consumer by artificially high price supports—exceeding $1 billion, with proposed budgetary outlay for price-support programs in 1960 reaching $5.4 billion, and with the built-in pressures in the present program to continue to increase these figures so long as this program remains in effect, Congress is presented with one of the primary challenges of this session—a challenge that must be met—a challenge that it is my hope the majority leadership will fully accept in the best interests of the sound fiscal future of our Republic.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. McINTYRE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I ardently support the President's thought, as expressed in his farm message, of using our surplus foods for the advancement of peace.

It should be noted that the Department of Agriculture has been cooperating in this concept, giving full recognition to the fact that diet has an essential bearing on the nature of man; that a full stomach empties the mind of desperate thoughts. The Department has been strengthening our relationships with our free friends abroad by utilizing governmental agencies and charitable organizations for the distribution of surplus food commodities, using every available agency to accomplish this purpose. And there is cogent evidence to point up the beneficial impact of such an approach.

One could never in good conscience question the wisdom of expanding this service of using our surplus commodities to advance minimum health standards for those who are free of despotism but enslaved by hunger—the concept that embodies the theme of "pieces of food to promote peace" unquestionably has great merit.

This program balanced with full use of commodities for our needy at home should be programs in which we all join in our efforts toward constructive solutions to these problems.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washintgon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, this is a time of crucial decision.

The President's message on agriculture outlines most graphically the challenges confronting the Congress.

It is essential that every Member of Congress carefully evaluate the recommendations submitted to us.

The President pointed out that the price-support and production-control programs have not worked; that the control program does not control; that the program is excessively expensive.

Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to stabilize farm prices and income for fiscal 1959 it is expected the Government will spend $5.4 billion, or 7 percent of the entire amount of Federal expenditures. Yet this vast outlay of Federal funds has not solved basic farm problems. As the President has stated: "These heavy costs might be justifiable if they were solving the problems of our farmers and if they were leading to a better balance of supplies and markets. But unfortunately this is not true."

Farm legislation must be devised to meet the situation of today. As I recently said to the House in discussing this same farm problem, 30 economists testifying in November 1957 before the Joint Congressional Economic Subcommittee were polled as to where to reduce the nondefense budget and farm spending was listed as the No. 1 area for cuts.

I agree with the President that farm difficulties are not attributable to the farmers' failure but instead to the lack of programs of building markets instead of losing markets.

The proposals in the President's message are intended to build markets and on that one score alone deserve sympathetic study.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON HOUSING

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RAINS], I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Housing be permitted to sit during general debate during the sessions of the House today and through Wednesday of next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN PROBLEMS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems of the District of Columbia Committees of the House and Senate be authorized to submit its final report to the Clerk of the House during the recess of the House, in order to comply with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 172.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

FLOOR STATEMENT ON LABOR REFORM BILL

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a companion bill to S. 505, which the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] introduced in the Senate last week. The bill is designed to strengthen legitimate unionism in this country by cutting out the cancer of labor racketeering and corruption.

It is an improved version of the bill that passed by an 88–1 margin in the Senate last year. There is no reason why this bill, clearly aimed to curb union racketeering, should not pass through both Houses this year.

Unless it does, the racketeers will remain free to continue their flagrant abuse of the public trust, and antiunion extremists will continue to enjoy the opportunity of whipping up and distorting genuine public sentiment in order to indulge in a union-busting campaign with the aid of the McClellan committee disclosures.

Mr. Speaker, the great majority of people in this country favor the prompt passage of a bill that would deal directly with the practices of union racketeers and corrupt management middlemen. So do the majority of thoughtful union leaders, because the great percentage of law-abiding and honest union workers have been smeared by the strong-arm and undercover practices of the James Hoffas, Dave Becks, and Johnny Dios. The whole labor movement has suffered for the sins of these few.

But the widely shared hope for quick reform will be indefinitely delayed if we make the mistake of combining the measures in this bill with the much more complex and controversial business of overhauling the Taft-Hartley Act to deal with the power balance between unions and management in new provisions affecting collective bargaining, secondary boycotts, union security and other areas.

It is true that this bill contains some amendments to the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, but they do not deal with any of the broad issues affecting the economic or bargaining power of either side. These amendments are necessary if Congress is to attack effectively the problem of racketeering.

It would be a dishonest and self-defeating maneuver to use these amendments as a springboard for unrelated efforts to revamp the exciting labor-management structure. Such action must be provided for in separate legislation after a detailed and nonpartisan study has been made.

In capsule form, this bill contains these main provisions:

First. It requires a comprehensive and detailed report of a union's financial operations, with provisions for reporting transactions by union officials which might constitute a conflict of interest.

Second. It assures regular elections of union officials by secret ballot; requires prior notification of election dates; and allows members to nominate and vote for opposing slates without coercion or restraint.

Third. It provides criminal penalties for embezzlement of union funds and permits individual union members to sue union officers convicted of embezzlement. It also prohibits union leaders from obtaining loans greater than $1,500 from the union organization.

Fourth. It prohibits "shakedown" picketing which has no other purpose than to force an employer to pay off the union officials involved.

Fifth. It authorizes the Secretary of Labor to investigate any person or labor organization suspected of violating the reporting and disclosure provisions of the bill.

Sixth. It requires employers to report, with certain exceptions, any loans or other payments to officials or employes of a labor union other than regular compensation. It also forbids employers to make loans to any labor official who is seeking to represent the employees.

Seventh. It requires employers to list expenditures for labor relations consultants and expenditures in excess of $2,500 for the purpose of persuading employees on matters pertaining to their right to organize and bargain collectively.

A more complete review of the provisions of the bill are contained in Senator KENNEDY'S excellent presentation on pages 883–888 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 20, 1959.

Mr. Speaker, these are badly needed reforms. It is hard to see who can quarrel with them except the racketeers themselves and those who would rather preserve a political issue than pass legislation. I am confident that the Congress will press forward to speedy adoption of this or similar legislation.

AMEND THE CONSTITUTION—LET THE PEOPLE SPEAK

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I have before me a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I am introducing in the House today. It states simply:

That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The judicial powers of the United States shall not give the Supreme Court of the United States the power to overrule, modify, or change any prior decision of that Court construing the Constitution of the United States or acts of Congress promulgated pursuant thereto.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in three-fourths of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 7 years from the date of submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

It will be noted that the proposed amendment adheres closely to the language of the 11th amendment which was submitted by Congress to the States and approved by them to accomplish a like purpose. A precedent for the amendment thus is found in the 11th amendment which was adopted to overcome the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall. 419, I Law Ed. 440) holding that a State could be sued by a citizen of another State in assumpsit.

Precedent No. 2 is found in the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments which were adopted following the War Between the States and which completely overcame the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, a decision which contributed materially to bringing about that unfortunate conflict.

Precedent No. 3 is found in the decision of the Supreme Court in Pollock v. Lowe (247 U.S. 165) which led to the adoption of the 16th amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the amendment I am introducing has been pointed out most adequately by others in the recent past. I refer in particular to the report adopted by 36 State Chief Justices at their 1958 meeting in California in which they were critical of the U.S. Supreme Court declaring that the Court "has tended to adopt the role of policymaker without proper judicial restraint." This report, approved by the chief justices of three-fourths of the Nation's States, found that the present Supreme Court has abused the power given to it by the Constitution. The Court is pictured as invading fields of Government reserved by the Constitution to the States.

As I have repeatedly stated, we must not lose sight of the fact that the very name of our Nation indicates that it is to be composed of States. The Supreme Court of a bygone day said in Texas v. White 7 Wall, 700, 721 (1868):

The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union of indestructible States.

I would like to quote further from the report issued by the State chief justices as carried in the October 3, 1958, edition of U.S. News & World Report:

We do not believe that either the framers of the original Constitution or the possibly somewhat less gifted draftsmen of the 14th amendment ever contemplated that the Supreme Court would, or should, have the almost unlimited policymaking powers which it now exercises * * *.

It is strange, indeed, to reflect that, under a Constitution which provides for a system of checks and balances and of distribution of power between National and State governments, one branch of our Government—the Supreme Court—should attain the immense and, in many respects, dominant power which it now wields. We believe that the great principle of distribution of powers among the various branches of government and between levels of government has vitality today and is the crucial base of our democracy.

We further believe that, in construing and applying the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, this principle of the division of power based upon whether a matter is primarily of national or of local concern should not be lost sight of or ignored, especially in fields which bear upon the meaning of a constitutional or statutory provision, or the validity of State action presented for review. For with due allowance for the changed conditions under which it may or must operate, the principle is as worthy of our consideration today as it was of the consideration of the great men who met in 1787 to establish our Nation as a nation.

I shall not quote further but I am confident most of my distinguished colleagues have read of the meeting and studied the report and the proceedings.

I call specific attention to the fact that there were 36 State chief justices who had a part in issuing the report on the usurpation of powers by the Supreme Court. In no way can those who clamor for social reforms claim that the report was the work of a minority group or that it represented the thinking only of Senators and Representatives from the South. The 36 State chief justices, themselves responsible for protecting the individual as well as upholding our American way of life, have expressed their views. It may well be wise and prudent for the Supreme Court members, as well as the good people of these United States, to give careful study to the statements of these learned men of law.

I contend that it is of extreme importance that the judicial powers of the Supreme Court be limited so as not to give to the Court power to overrule, modify or change any prior decision of that Court construing the Constitution of the United States and acts of Congress promulgated pursuant thereto. This power is now practiced by the Court and can only be limited by a constitutional amendment such as the one I am introducing today. If this amendment, or similar legislation, is not passed promptly, the Supreme Court of the United States can be expected to continue to turn itself into a judicial oligarchy in which it amends the Constitution and the acts of Congress at its pleasure. The only place the people can turn to bring an end to this dangerous usurpation of power is to the Congress, praying that it submit to the States a constitutional amendment which provides a remedy.

I further refer my colleagues to an article in the U.S. News & World Report of October 24, 1958. In this article, Alfred J. Schweppe, a member of the board of editors of the American Bar Association Journal, a former dean of the University of Washington Law School, and a former president of the Bar Association of the State of Washington, states:

I absolutely reject the idea that the Supreme Court has the power to rewrite the Constitution according to its concepts of sociological or economic change. That is what the amendatory process is for. I do not accept Justice Douglas' blunt view that the amendatory process is too slow as anything but a violation of the oath to support the Constitution in all of its parts. * * * In my opinion, once the Court has construed a constitutional provision, that construction should stand until changed by amendment, unless later evidence is found of the intent of the framers of the provision which shows the first construction to have been erroneous. * * * Any other approach seems to me to lead to the inevitable conclusion that the Constitution is the plaything of the judges at any time in office. * * * My objection is to the reckless manner in which the present Court flouts the precedents laid down by the great Courts ahead of it and, glibly bypassing the constitutional amendment process of article V, rewrites the Constitution in its own image.

The Supreme Court, as a result of its recent decisions, must accept responsibility for much of the unrest among the people of the United States in the field of racial problems. It must accept responsibility for dividing the country unduly over school problems and for setting back by half a century the efforts of men of good will in both races who through the years have striven to resolve racial problems harmoniously. The Court must take responsibility for cases of violence which have resulted from these and other decisions. Also, the Court must accept responsibility for the fact that confessed criminals now walk the streets free men—ready to strike again—released on the flimsiest of technicalities. The Court can never explain to my satisfaction its attitude toward Communists with whom it has ruled 32 times in the 39 cases involving communism under the present Chief Justice.

In summary, I believe, and I am confident a majority of the citizens of our Nation will agree with me, that unless there is persuasive evidence of the intent of the Constitution and its amendments that the prior decisions of the Court are wrong, these prior decisions should stand. That is what my amendment proposes. I do not think tradition and precedent should be ignored by the Supreme Court in its decisions. The framers of the Constitution provided orderly legal processes by which major issues can be decided. My amendment will reaffirm the significance of those processes and return the policy-making and legislative powers to the branches of Government which were intended to exercise jurisdiction over them. Ratification of this amendment would not freeze into effect the recent Supreme Court decisions which are so odious to many Americans. This is true because of the fact that those decisions are in themselves modifications or reversals of prior Court decisions which this constitutional amendment would uphold.

I trust that my proposal will have the support of my colleagues in the House and in the Senate, but I challenge those who dissent to give the American people a chance to express themselves on the measure I am introducing today. Let the people vote. They are vitally affected by what the Court is doing but they have no way to express their approval or disapproval.

We have but to look around us to see the chaotic conditions we are experiencing. These conditions can be corrected. They should be corrected through the provisions of our Constitution. No greater form of government has ever been devised and we must not forget that our Government is built upon the standards of freedom. I urge favorable consideration of this proposed amendment to the Constitution so that the people may in fact speak for themselves.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ANDREWS. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Florida for the fine statement he has made.

He has pointed out a threat which confronts the American people, which confronts our whole system of government. He has pointed out the fact that the Court has disregarded the sacred doctrine of the law, the doctrine of stare decisis, which has been the doctrine that has preserved for us a system of government of laws instead of a government of men. I hate to think it, but it is my opinion that we no longer have a government of laws; we have a government of men. The law of this land today is what the men on the Supreme Court say it should be. We are living under a dictatorship. The dictator is the Supreme Court. I certainly hope that the gentleman's bill will become law.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman from Florida and his views on these subjects. I would like to pursue one matter, if I may. That is whether or not the gentleman believes that under the Constitution as it is drawn today this Congress could take some action to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

I refer to article III, section 2, of the Constitution, which sets up the jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has original jurisdiction in four instances. In all other cases the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

It seems to me the Constitution, recognizing life tenure in one instance, gave to those who must go to the people the right and the authority to limit that jurisdiction of those who have a life tenure and who are not responsible to the people.

Does the gentleman agree that under the Constitution as it exists today this Congress if it would could pass legislation to limit that jurisdiction and accomplish some of the things which the gentleman has called to our attention today?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to my distinguished and good friend from Ohio in his expert knowledge of the law. Of course I feel that there is also a remedy in the direction he has proposed. This Congress should explore every possibility of obtaining relief.

Mr. BOW. I simply want to read from the Constitution, if I may, so the record will be complete. I quote from article III, section 2:

> In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

The founders of our country, the Constitution makers, recognized that the Constitution gave that authority to us and we should exercise it if we would.

Mr. SIKES. I think we should seek relief by every legal means that is open to us. We should pursue both the legislative and the amendatory process. The amendatory process is a slower one, but it has the effect of giving the people an opportunity to speak decisively and to write law that is permanent.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my distinguished colleague from Florida for bringing to us today this spendid talk and suggesting to us many of the problems that we face now as we consider the effect of the decisions of our Supreme Court.

May I say to my distinguished colleague and personal friend that, as he has expressed, I am tremendously worried about the security of our country, just the basic security of this land that we love, as we view some of the decisions of the Supreme Court regarding their attitude on Communists, on passport legislation, on the right of a State to try a citizen suspected of sedition.

I hope and pray, Mr. Speaker, that many more of us from all the sections of this great country will become concerned and associate ourselves with the distinguished gentleman from Florida, and take some of the corrective steps that are necessary.

Mr. SIKES. I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GARY. I want to congratulate the gentleman upon his remarks, and particularly upon his statement that we should explore every avenue to correct the situation in which we now find ourselves.

I heard the statement made a few days ago on this floor by a gentleman from New York that this Supreme Court is one of the great Courts in the history of the Nation. I do not believe he will find many lawyers who will agree with him in that statement, in fact I do not know of a single one. The gentleman is a lawyer, but he served for a time in the Department of Justice, and apparently he has been contaminated by some of the views that seem to pervade that Department. The facts are, Mr. Speaker, that today no lawyer can give a satisfactory opinion on the Constitution of the United States. There was a time, when a lawyer was called upon to decide a constitutional question, that he could do so with some degree of certainty, because he relied upon the Constitution. But, it is not a question of the Constitution today. It is a question of the philosophy of the Supreme Court at the particular time that the question upon which the opinion is rendered is being considered by the Court. This country has grown great and has developed one of the highest codes of justice found anywhere because our forefathers established a government of laws and not of men. As my colleague, the gentleman from Alabama just pointed out that situation is rapidly changing, and today it is becoming a government of men and not of laws. When you entrust the Government of this country to a small tribunal of nine people, you are establishing a dictatorship of the judiciary which might prove as oppressive as the dictatorships now ruling with an iron hand in some of the foreign lands.

Mr. SIKES. The gentleman has made a very sound observation.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the argument is being advanced over and over again here on the floor of the House, and I understand by even some members of the Supreme Court and certain advocates of these strange decisions of the Supreme Court, that we should have these unconstitutional Court decisions because of what people abroad think and because of certain criticisms of people abroad about the way our Constitution operates. Well, that being true, certainly these same people should get behind the gentleman's amendment and let us prove to the world how the American people and our American democratic representative processes really operate. Let the world see that we are willing to let the people decide this issue. I commend the gentleman for his forthright statement and for his amendment.

Mr. SIKES. I appreciate the gentleman's statement very much.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I just want to join my colleagues in commending our distinguished colleague from Florida on the presentation he has made here today in the discussion of this important constitutional question.

Like many other colleagues and people throughout the United States, I am quite concerned—and it is a rather growing concern—as are others with the trend which we have observed for the last several years. It is a disturbing factor. And, I am glad to see the gentleman as well as others who are striving to seek a solution, a way, a method in an effort to bring about a change in this trend and bring about stable constitutional government.

At the opening of this session of the Congress I, along with other colleagues, joined the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Judge SMITH, in the sponsorship of the bill the Congress considered in the 85th Congress.

Mr. SIKES. At that time H.R. 3.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; the identical bill I have introduced in this Congress is H.R. 518. As a matter of fact, the House passed it and only by one vote did it fail to pass the other body, as I understand. Now, I recognize the problem the gentleman has so well pointed up here today, and that is that in certain areas H.R. 3 will not reach the ultimate objective. At the outset of this Congress I also proposed a constitutional amendment in the hope of reaching some of these problems, not that I, in my own right as a Member of the Congress and as a lawyer, recognize that the Court in its decisions in some of the cases has followed precedent and followed the law of the land itself. But, I do recognize that there must be avenues of approach to the problem, and I want to join others in seeing that a way is found that these constitutional questions can be brought to the forefront and to the attention of the American people.

When, in the memory of this generation, does the gentleman remember, Mr. Speaker, have we before seen members of the highest court of the land going out to the American people as a forum and trying to apologize or defend their own actions? Yet we have seen this within recent months. After the action of the chief justices of the State supreme courts and after other pronouncements have been delivered all over the land, we find the Chief Justice publicly trying to defend the Court. And we find another member of the Court trying to defend their action. And only recently another member in New York tried to do the same thing.

I say to my colleagues that in my opinion this is a matter which the members of the Court themselves must have some feeling about or they would not be trying to explain to the American people their attitude, trying to defend themselves in their decision, in this most important fight. And I say it is a fight throughout the Nation. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia who said a few days ago that it may be one issue at the moment affecting one section of this country, or one issue today, but tomorrow it may affect another section, or next year, or in the years to come on other issues; we had better take warning now or the greatest system of government yet devised will be threatened and seriously jeopardized.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me, so I may reply to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS]?

Mr. SIKES. Of course, I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I think the gentleman will find the answer to that question, that is why those judges are going about trying to defend their decisions, if he will look at that little pamphlet that came out carrying the decision in the segregation case; if he will look at the bottom of page 9, and then over through page 10 and on to 11 and read the reasons given by Chief Justice Warren, for his conclusions, he will understand why he is trying to justify those conclusions. Of course, I do not believe what he said. To me his argument was that no one, for example, could become a clergyman unless he acquired his education while associating with a group of sinners. A colored boy could not be taught honesty unless he got next to a crooked, dishonest wihte lad.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman may be correct, but I still feel that since so many people are calling this issue to the attention of the American people, they, themselves, must feel that there is something here that dangerously threatens the Court and that sacred instrument, the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes. And in addition consider the absurdity of his reasoning. Take another look at it—read the decision again.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate our distinguished friend and colleague from Florida on the clarity of the exposition which he has made today of his proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I commend a careful reading of that proposed amendment together with a careful reading of the remarks of the gentleman from Florida to all of our colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I fear that we are entering into an era of judicial dictatorship. We may have, indeed, entered that era already. During the past 4½ years the Supreme Court of the United States has undertaken to announce a doctrine and a policy of utter and complete disregard for established judicial precedents, and for the written word of provisions of the Constitution itself as well as of laws enacted by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I think we are all aware that the safety of the people and the security of our Nation are, indeed, the supreme law. Yet by recent actions of the Supreme Court of the United States convicted conspirators against the peace and security of the Government of the United States and of the people thereof have been turned loose to continue their diabolical conspiracy to destroy, to overturn, to overthrow the Government and the Constitution of the United States under which and under God our Nation and our people have achieved a position of world leadership unequaled in the entire history of civilized man.

Mr. Speaker, the time is now and the place is here for the elected Representatives of the people of the United States to assert the right of this legislative branch of our Government, indeed, to assert the right of the people of the United States to prevent this country from being crushed under the heel of dictatorship, whether it be by the judicial branch or by any branch of our Government. God forbid that the rights and the liberties of all of our people be destroyed by the malignant desire of 9 black-robed justices of any court on earth.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ANDREWS. Recently, within the last year or two, a former president of the American Bar Association told a subcommittee of our Appropriations Committee that 90 percent of the lawyers of America had no respect for the legal ability of the present members of the Supreme Court. Also, recently, within the last few years, this Court rendered a decision in the Anti-Subversive Activities Control Board case which was described by a member of the Justice Department as being the greatest victory the Communists have won in the last decade.

With those situations existing, no respect by a majority of the members of the bar of America, and the Communists having a field day in America, certainly some action should be taken to curb the Supreme Court.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HALEY. I commend my colleague from Florida for offering this. I, too, want to challenge the people who seem to be so interested in minority groups, and so forth. Let us submit this question to the American people and let them pass on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules, it will be necessary to get the consent of all the other gentlemen having special orders.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those desiring to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on this subject may do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Yielding to the desire of the gentleman from Florida, Mr. Speaker, I shall extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has that consent.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] has shown a depth of understanding in this instance, which he always shows when he presents a program on the floor of the House of Representatives. Members who are interested in the safety and the preservation of the charter of our Government should take time to read and digest the brilliant remarks that are his in the course of this present speech. I certainly commend them to careful study.

Only today, Mr. Speaker, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from a local paper published in Shreveport, La., the Shreveport Times, scoring our highest judicial tribunal for a further breach of the important rule of stare decisis in a very recent decision The question involved in this decision was whether peace had returned to this country, and this Court so interpreted a statute of Congress as to cause a duly convicted felon to be released from custody. In doing so the U.S. Supreme Court overturned previous decisions of many years standing. The final result is that it released one duly convicted criminal who had legally been charged, tried, and convicted of a heinous crime and is now at large on society to further pursue his criminal designs and intent.

The gentleman from Florida is certainly pursuing the right course when he suggests to the House that the Supreme Court be curbed from further usurping powers of government. Our forefathers expressed the fear that if dictatorship ever came to our land under our Constitution, it would be through the usurpation by the judiciary of powers under our Constitution. As surely as the sun rises in the east in the morning, this tribunal of nine black-robed Justices who are ensconced in that marble palace across the way in front of the Capitol are moving toward a judicial dictatorship in this land. Honest, loyal, fearless, red-blooded Americans will realize the sinister influence that falls over the Capitol now like a pall and will move aggressively to prevent further usurpation of judicial powers and functions by these nine men who compose our U.S. Supreme Court.

I thank the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] for this opportunity and hope he continues his fine work in behalf of a well-balanced American Government under our Constitution.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida has presented to the House a most forthright statement, and for his action and courage he is to be commended.

The issue presented is certainly timely and stimulating to our thinking. I should not go so far as to say that the U.S. Supreme Court is engaged in a diabolical conspiracy against the United States. Certainly I do not impugn the patriotism of the members of the Court. However, I do agree that some of the major problems with which we are confronted today are the result of actions and decisions of the Court and the Chief Executive. I refer to the decisions of the Court in the school desegregation case and the actions of the Chief Executive in ordering the paratroopers to invade one of our sovereign States—an action which was wholly improper, and certainly not the best method to proceed on in the matter.

While we, as Members of Congress, receive many letters calling for legislative action on the problems produced by this critical situation, I want to repeat and to emphasize that these problems are not the result of actions of the Congress but of the Chief Executive and of the Court. Certainly we should, in discharging our responsibilities, with respect to these problems, explore every possible avenue of approach to their solution.

I commend the gentleman from Florida for bringing this matter before the House for discussion. Certainly both the legislative approach and the process of amending the Constitution afford means for the solution of our domestic issues of present-day concern.

When a majority of the chief justices of the supreme courts of our States, by deliberate action and resolution, censure or condemn the decisions and the trend of decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, certainly we are more than justified in exploring all means possible to resolve these serious conflicts. Our judges are not prone to condemn other judges and therefore their action in this instance is most significant.

We can discharge our responsibilities by endeavoring to be constructive rather than impugning the patriotism of any of our fellow citizens.

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I join in the concern being expressed here on the floor today with regard to certain Supreme Court decisions and with the general observation that the Court by some of its decisions has placed on its shoulders some of the responsibility for conditions generated by those decisions. But I suggest, that to leave the problem there is to shirk our coequal legislative responsibility of doing something about those decisions where we clearly have the constitutional power and, in my opinion, the clear duty in protecting the best interests of all the people of this Nation, to pass legislation to clarify or overcome some of those decisions and thus remedy the ill effects stemming therefrom.

Congress has, indisputably on the record, shirked this responsibility and duty in this respect.

As the ranking minority member of the Special Subcommittee on Supreme Court Decisions of the Judiciary Committee of the House, in the 85th Congress, I joined the members of that subcommittee in working diligently and I believe sensibly in reporting out legislation to overcome some of these decisions.

A bill similar to the one I introduced to clarify the Mallory decision, mentioned by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] was reported after lengthy hearings and consideration but was assigned to the legislative graveyard in the dying hours of the session even after being passed by the House with a substantial majority.

A bill that passed the House unanimously in its final form, to overcome some of the effects of the Yates decision by strengthening the Smith Act by redefining the meaning of the word "organize" in order to outlaw the organizing of Communist cells in this country, received similar graveyard treatment.

H.R. 3, the Smith States rights bill, one of which I introduced, met the same fate, and the State laws on sedition remain in jeopardy so long as the Nelson case decided from Pennsylvania remains in full force and effect—unchallenged.

I have reintroduced these bills again this session hoping that this Congress will accept its true responsibility and take effective action on these matters. To do less, is to shirk our duty and responsibility. I suggest that the last Congress thus must also accept its full share of blame for the after-effects of some of these decisions, due to its position of inaction. I trust the record this session will reflect a willingness on the part of the majority leadership to exert leadership in this vital field.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, although time does not permit thorough and complete observations of the amendment submitted by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES], I deem it necessary to immediately rise in opposition to his proposal. The ostensible purpose of his proposed amendment is to force the Supreme Court into a death grip with its own precedents. The amendment apparently seeks to command the Court to an absolute compliance with the rule of stare decisis.

Such a rule of strict compliance with precedent would stifle growth and development in the law. As Justice Brandeis pointed out, stare decisis is not "a universal, inexorable command—but simply a rule of policy—and usually the wise policy, because in most matters it is more important that the applicable rule of law be settled than that it be settled right."

The Court should certainly have the right to overrule its earlier decisions. As Justice Brandeis further said, "The Court bows to the lessons of experience and the force of better reasoning, recognizing the process of trial and error, so fruitful in the physical sciences, is appropriate also in the judicial function. The decision of the previous case may have been rendered upon an inadequate presentation of then existing conditions, but the conditions may have changed meanwhile. Moreover, the judgment of the Court in the earlier decision may have been influenced by prevailing views as to economic or social policy which have since been abandoned. In cases involving constitutional issues of the character discussed, this Court must, in order to reach sound conclusions, feel free to bring its opinions into agreement with experience and with facts newly ascertained."

I cannot and do not agree with all of the decisions of our Supreme Court. My disagreement, however, does not compel me to curtail or restrict the Court in the conduct of its judicial business. The Congress has unquestioned authority to take legislative action to correct its specific differences of opinion with the Court's judicial interpretations.

The proposed amendment appears to be another in a series of vindictive attacks on the Supreme Court for its school-desegregation decision of 1954. Today's arguments in support of the amendment were not supported by legally convincing arguments.

As a Member of this body and as a lawyer, I do not feel called upon to defend the Supreme Court from the attack upon its integrity which has been implied by this proposed constitutional amendment and by argument in its support. The Court has faced such attacks before and will survive.

However, if the proposed amendment should by any chance clear this Congress and be adopted by the several States, the Court would be fatally frozen to its precedents—both wise and unwise. As a matter of fact, the adoption of this amendment would clear the way for electronic Supreme Court decisions. The precedents could be card punched and placed into the machine and judicial decisions could be promptly played out without time-consuming argument or concern for changing conditions.

The proponents of this amendment argue against the threatened dictatorship of the judiciary—and yet by this very amendment they would seek to establish an irrefutable dictatorship of past precedents—the rule of uncomplaining dead men. Errors in the law would remain so forever. Such is not my concept of the judicial process.

I earnestly urge my colleagues to abandon their massive attack on the Supreme Court. Congress has suitable remedies to correct almost every Supreme Court decision in which it is displeased. These remedies should be attempted before massive retaliation is undertaken against the Court.

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendment to the Constitution introduced by my good friend and colleague from my neighboring State of Florida, Mr. SIKES, has my wholehearted support and I fully concur in his remarks concerning the urgent necessity for the adoption of this amendment by this Congress.

I have read the report which was adopted by 36 State chief justices at their 1958 meeting, in which report these chief justices from 36 of our sovereign States declared that our Supreme Court has tended to adopt the role of policymaker without judicial restraint. I have had occasion to personally discuss this report with nearly half of these chief justices, and on many occasions before and since this report was issued I spent hours with many outstanding men, going over this matter, including a great and good American who we thought made one of the greatest speeches ever made on this issue, and I am referring to our own Judge J. Ed Livingston, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, one of the most learned lawyers of all time.

I believe that all right-thinking Americans will support my good friend and colleague, BOB SIKES, in his proposed amendment.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, over 120 Members of the House have today gone on record in support of a bill establishing certain minimum standards of unemployment compensation in addition to standards that have been in the Federal law since enactment of the original Social Security Act in 1935.

Under unanimous consent, I include at this point a list of those Members who have asked to be announced in support of this bill, some of whom may also intend to sponsor it.

HUGH J. ADDONIZIO, New Jersey; LEROY H. ANDERSON, Montana; VICTOR L. ANFUSO, New York; THOMAS L. ASHLEY, Ohio.

Why do we now so urgently need minimum standards provided in this bill?

Because, Mr. Speaker, in the absence of these standards, we have been slipping backward since 1939. The need has been becoming more urgent year by year. Lack of these standards has cost individual workers, their families, and the national economy dearly.

In 1939 the weekly benefits payable to insured unemployed workers actually averaged 50 percent of their full-time weekly wages. Today, average weekly unemployment compensation benefit payments have fallen until they are now less than 33 percent of full-time weekly wages.

Because we do not have an adequate standard setting the minimum number of weeks for which an insured unemployed worker is entitled to benefit payments, workers are exhausting their benefit rights long before finding work. As will be shown later in this discussion, duration of unemployment has tended to increase year by year so that the 39 weeks' duration provided in this bill is needed to meet the needs of the unemployed individual and the economy as a whole.

Weekly benefit payments are today so inadequate that insured workers and their families are moving from the unemployment compensation rolls to the relief rolls, where they remain for weeks and even months before obtaining reemployment.

For the most part a catchup bill, it proposes to get back to where we were in 1939, back to 50 percent of full-time weekly wages, to a duration more nearly adequate to meet anticipated periods of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, the need for minimum standards to make benefit amounts and duration more nearly adequate is generally recognized.

Dr. Arthur Burns, former Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors to President Eisenhower, has stated the need for Federal minimum benefit standards.

The Federal Advisory Council on Economic Security has stated the need for Federal minimum benefit standards.

The Rockefeller Brothers Fund Report of April 1958, stated the need for Federal minimum benefit standards.

For years Secretary of Labor Mitchell and President Eisenhower have described the need for minimum benefit standards and have called upon the States to raise the weekly amounts and extend duration.

This year, in his budget message of January 19, President Eisenhower restated the need in stronger terms than he had ever before used—and he did not this time pass the buck to the several States. He said:

> Our unemployment compensation system has again demonstrated its importance in providing income for the unemployed and thereby supporting the economy while alleviating hardship. Temporary assistance of the kind provided by the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 is in no sense a substitute for widening the coverage of unemployment compensation and extending the duration of benefits and increasing benefit amounts under the Federal-State system. I have many times urged such action. I urge it again now with added conviction as a result of last year's experience.

Mr. Speaker, as we believe our discussion today will make clear, years of experience have shown that the only way to get such action is through Federal action, action by this House and by this Congress. We shall show why it is that no State has done, and no State feels it can run the risk of doing, by itself, what it is generally agreed should be done in every State. We believe the case for Federal action in this session of this Congress is clear.

What would this bill do?

It would continue the present Federal-State unemployment compensation system, but it would correct inadequacies in that system by establishing certain minimum standards which every State must meet in order to be entitled to the benefits provided.

The proposed bill would:

First. Provide for the payment of weekly unemployment compensation benefits to insured eligible unemployed workers of not less than 50 percent of the individual's weekly wages so long as that amount is not more than two-thirds of the weekly average wage in the State, an amount which, as Members know, varies from State to State.

Second. Establish a uniform benefit period of 39 weeks for insured and eligible unemployed workers.

Third. Include within the system employers of one or more individuals, except for domestics and agriculture employees.

Fourth. Permit States free choice in providing for uniform rate reductions to employers as well as individual experience-rated reductions in payroll tax rates.

In addition, the bill would allow that part of the payroll tax which is paid into the Federal Treasury, three-tenths of 1 percent, to be used to aid States whose reserves may be depleted by heavy drains upon State unemployment insurance trust funds.

We deem it important to emphasize what the proposed bill would not do. It would:

First. Not require any appropriation by Congress.

Second. Not change the present Federal-State system of operation.

Third. Not provide for any increase in the present Federal tax upon payrolls.

Moreover, in all probability it would not require an increase in the total payroll tax paid in any State beyond the 2.7 percent originally contemplated in title III of the Social Security Act of 1935 and unemployment compensation laws qualifying thereunder.

At present, with wholly inadequate weekly benefit payments being given to insured unemployed workers for inadequate periods of time, tax rates for some employers in some States have been cut almost to the vanishing point. Unemployment insurance trust funds wax fat while workers and their families go hungry. A table setting forth the relationship among lean benefits and fat trust funds and nominal tax rates will be introduced later in this discussion.

Through the years, the States have been divided and conquered by the argument that in no State could members of the legislature afford to obey their best instincts, their best judgment as to what was best for the individual unemployed worker, best for the economy of the State and Nation. In each State, the argument was made that decent standards would be disastrous, that other States having lower weekly benefit payments for shorter periods of time might offer plants the inducement of lower and lower tax rates on payrolls.

This is the long trail of degradation, a 20-year-old story of retreat from standards that seemed minimum in 1939.

Lack of these nationwide minimum standards has permitted the development of a profit incentive running into more than $1 billion a year. This incentive has spurred on special interests to hold down benefits both in amount and duration, to subvert and defeat the very purpose of the Federal-State system of unemployment compensation.

In asking for special orders to discuss this bill, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ], myself, and perhaps other colleagues, wish to put in the RECORD for the Members of the House and for the American people not only the essential facts about the bill, a section-by-section analysis of the bill, and the text of the bill itself, but also some evidence showing the nature and magnitude of the need for such legislation.

We propose to indicate in a brief and preliminary way the human and economic costs of not having such minimum standards, in terms of individuals, local communities, States, markets for manufactured and agricultural goods and services and in terms of the economic health, strength, and security of our Nation.

Let it be said, first, that we would be much better off today if, instead of having passed a Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act last year which offered extension of benefits that were inadequate both in terms of weekly amounts and number of weeks duration, and was used by only 17 of the 48 States, we had enacted in 1958 the bill for nationwide minimum standards of unemployment compensation that was before us then and has been introduced again today in substantially the same form.

A year ago it was raining. We were having what was politely termed a "recession." We had more than 5 million unemployed. It was suggested that, instead of going out in the rain to fix the roof, the Federal Government lend such States as wished to borrow a supply of dishpans to catch the rain as it came through the roof.

Today, a year later, it is raining again. For many areas of the country and for millions of unemployed workers and their families, it has never stopped raining. The number of unemployed is again above 4 million and rising.

More than 2½ million insured unemployed workers have exhausted their rights to benefits under State laws; more than 650,000 workers in 17 States taking advantage of the dishpan policy adopted in 1958 have exhausted both their rights under the regular State law and the temporary Federal extension.

Exhaustions are continuing today at the rate of 250,000 a month, with the expiration of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act set for April 1, 1959, unless extended. And in the name of economy the administration has taken a firm position against any such extension, counting on the lapsing to save a few hundred million dollars toward the balancing of an unemployment-as-usual, defense-at-bargain-rates budget.

If the present Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act were to be renewed, and many of us may think it must be continued in some form, not more than one-third of all who have exhausted their benefits under the permanent State and the temporary Federal laws would be likely to benefit to the extent of a single weekly benefit check.

For those who have suffered such long unemployment as to have been unable to establish a qualifying earnings record in a new benefit year, remedies, relief and restoration to employment must be found in other legislation such as increased Federal grants for public assistance to share the heavier burden now being borne by States and local communities struggling with persistent recession, in the pending area redevelopment and community facilities bills, in beefed up housing, airport and highway programs, in action to stop price gouging by monopolistic corporations "administering" higher and higher prices while sales lag and inventories pile up.

This is simply to say that enactment of this bill is one of the imperatives that this Congress must act upon if it is to meet the expectations of the American people as expressed so clearly last November and, incidentally, as the Employment Act of 1946 has intended all along. We shall not leap at one bound, or by the enactment of one law or one appropriation, from chronic mass unemployment, we shall not liberate ourselves by a single act from the pernicious anemia of underutilization of men, machines and money to the good health of full utilization contemplated and provided for in the Employment Act of 1946.

But enactment of this bill early in the session will help. It will be an omen and a promise that will give heart to people everywhere, to every employed and unemployed worker and, yes, to businessmen and financiers making plans for a future of expanding markets. They will know that this Congress is not going to be controlled by timidity or greed, either by fear of unemployment so heavy as to make payments of adequate benefits impossible or so costly as to require some employers to increase their payroll taxes slightly above the two-thirds of 1 percent or less that is now being paid by too many in too many States.

Before yielding the floor to my colleague from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ], with whom I am a working partner on this bill, I want to offer for the RECORD certain basic documents.

First, I insert at this point in the RECORD a very brief summary of the bill:

PROPOSED FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION BILL

The proposed Federal Unemployment Compensation Standards bill continues the present Federal-State unemployment compensation system. However, it corrects inadequacies in the present State laws by establishing additional standards to be met by States as a condition of employers getting credit against the Federal unemployment tax, and by establishing a system of reinsurance to aid depleted State reserves.

Such Federal standards are to be effective July 1, 1960, allowing a sufficient period for all State legislatures to meet and enact necessary amendments to State laws.

The proposed bill has the following provisions:

I. BENEFITS

Each individual's primary benefit shall be not less than 50 percent of his weekly wages subject to a maximum primary benefit of not less than 66⅔ percent of the State's average weekly wage. (The claimant shall receive either the maximum or 50 percent of his weekly wages, whichever is less.)

II. DURATION

Benefits shall be payable to all unemployed insured individuals for a period of not less than 39 weeks, provided they meet all eligibility requirements under the State law.

III. ELIGIBILITY

A. No wage qualifying requirement in a State law can be more restrictive than base year earnings of 30 times the weekly benefit amount, or 1½ times high quarter wages, or 20 weeks employment.

B. State benefits cannot be denied or reduced because of the receipt of payments under a plan established to supplement unemployment benefits under the law.

IV. COVERAGE

Employers who have one or more individuals in their employ at any time during the taxable year will be covered.

V. FINANCING

A. States will be permitted to provide for uniform rate reductions to all employers as well as individual experience-rated reductions.

B. Proceeds of the Federal Unemployment Tax Act will be earmarked in a Federal unemployment account in the Federal Treasury. Such account will be used for (a) paying the Federal and State administrative expenses (including the establishment of a contingency fund) and (b) reinsurance grants to those States who are in financial difficulty because of high rates of unemployment.

The need for some standards in unemployment insurance has been recognized by the Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security (report to the Secretary of Labor, Dec. 3, 1958), by the Rockefeller Brothers report (April 1958), by the Governors of several States, and by Arthur F. Burns, president, National Bureau of Economic Research.

The standard in this bill on the benefit amount is the formula recommended repeatedly to the States by President Eisenhower in the Economic Report.

This proposed bill would not require any appropriation by Congress.

Second, a section-by-section analysis of the bill:

ANALYSIS OF FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION STANDARDS BILL

The bill recognizes that in order to achieve the goals of employment stabilization and security against unemployment and in order to strengthen the economy and the welfare of the Nation, certain improvements in the unemployment compensation program are necessary. It extends to certain new categories of workers the benefit of the unemployment compensation program and prescribes certain uniform minimum standards with respect to weekly unemployment compensation benefits and the period of time for which such benefits will be payable. It also provides for the establishment of a fund composed of present Federal unemployment tax collections from which the administrative costs of the program will be paid and from which reinsurance grants will be made to States which suffer excessively high rates of unemployment.

Section 2 of the bill establishes the additional standards which a State law must meet in order to be certified by the Secretary of Labor for the purpose of permitting credit against the Federal tax for employer contributions under the State law. The additional standards cover the following areas: (1) The maximum and minimum weekly benefit amounts provided by the State law; and (2) the duration for which benefits are payable under the State law.

Among those who have recognized the need for Federal minimum benefit standards are:

(a) The Rockefeller Brothers Fund Report of April 1958.

(b) The Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security.

(c) Dr. Arthur Burns, former economic adviser to President Eisenhower.

1. WEEKLY BENEFIT AMOUNT

Section 2 requires that the maximum benefit under the State law be not less than an amount equal to two-thirds of the average weekly wage within such State. It also requires that subject to this maximum every individual receive a benefit equal to at least one-half of the individual's average weekly wage. In no case would an individual receive a benefit in excess of the State maximum.

Thus, if the average weekly wage in covered employment in State X is $66, the State law must provide a maximum weekly benefit of at least $40. An individual whose average weekly wage is less than $66 would be required to receive a weekly benefit of at least 50 percent of his own wage. The individual who earns $50 a week would only receive a weekly benefit of $25 a week. The individual who earns $60 a week would only receive $30 a week. In no case, however, would State X be required to pay anyone more than $40 weekly. Individuals who receive $80 a week would be entitled to the $40 but no individual who earns more would be paid a greater benefit.

The requirement that individuals be entitled to receive at least 50 percent of their average weekly wage as a necessary goal is consistent with the recommendations made by President Eisenhower in his Economic Report. As Secretary of Labor Mitchell has pointed out in letters to the Governors of all States, a weekly maximum along the lines recommended in this bill is necessary to accomplish the recommendations of the President.

In view of the inaction by State legislatures in meeting these goals, it is clear that if they are to be accomplished, congressional action along the lines recommended by this bill is necessary.

2. BENEFIT DURATION

Section 2 of the bill would require that all eligible individuals be entitled to benefits for at least 39 weeks of unemployment. This does not mean that every individual will automatically receive 39 weeks of benefits in a year. State laws all require that the individual be unemployed and that he be able and available for work during each week of unemployment.

With continued unemployment, the need for benefits of sufficient duration for all unemployed individuals is apparent. President Eisenhower also recommended that duration be uniformly extended for all claimants. While his recommendation to the States was limited to duration of 26 weeks, the continuation of heavy unemployment and the continued increase in the number of persons exhausting the benefit rights indicate the present need for benefits for a duration of longer than 26 weeks. The need for 39 weeks has already been recognized by the last Congress which enacted the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958.

3. SUPPLEMENTAL UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

The only standard with respect to disqualification provisions of State laws applies to benefits paid under privately established supplemental benefit plans. Section 2 would specifically preclude the denial or reduction of State benefits because of the receipt of private supplemental unemployment benefits. Only four States now reduce benefits because of the receipt of SUB. Thirty-eight (38) States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii hold that the payment of supplemental unemployment benefits does not affect an individual's right to State unemployment compensation benefits.

Subsection (a) of section 3 of the bill extends the coverage of the Federal Unemployment Tax Act to employers of one or more individuals.

The extension of coverage to employers of one or more is consistent with the recommendations made by President Eisenhower. It does not mean that housewives who employ a domestic or a farmer employing one individual from time to time will have to pay unemployment contributions with respect to such individual. The present definition of employment which excludes domestic and agricultural service is not changed in this bill.

Subsection (c) of section 3 adds definitions of "benefit year," "base period," "high quarter wages," and "average weekly wage" to the present definitions. These definitions are necessary in order to avoid contravention by a State of the amendments proposed in subsection (a).

Section 4 would give additional freedom to the State in determining the methods of reducing employer's taxes under the State law below 2.7 percent. Under present law, if a State wishes to impose a tax lower than 2.7 percent on employers, it may only do so by instituting a system which rates individual employers on the basis of their own experience. A State which desires to levy a uniform rate of less than 2.7 percent on all employers is now unable to do so.

This amendment would permit a State to levy a uniform contribution rate of less than 2.7 percent. It would also permit a State which desires to continue a system of individual employer experience rates to continue to do so. In short, it imposes no new Federal requirement; it relaxes the existing requirements.

Section 5 amends those provisions of the Social Security Act relating to grants to States for administration of State unemployment compensation laws by providing that all collections under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act are earmarked in the Federal unemployment account in the unemployment trust fund. This account was established by Congress in 1947.

Section 5 provides that all funds for administration of State laws, including contingency amounts which are to be expended only in the event of unforeseen changes in economic conditions, shall be charged against the Federal unemployment account. Unemployment compensation administrative expenditures of the Department of Labor shall also be charged to the Federal unemployment account.

Section 6 repeals provisions of the present law inconsistent with the changes made in this bill.

Section 7 provides that a State whose accumulated funds for unemployment compensation has reached a precariously low condition will be entitled to a reinsurance grant from the Federal unemployment account. The amount of such grant will be limited to three-fourths of the excess by which compensation payable under such State law exceeds 2 percent of the State taxable payroll. In other words, only where unemployment benefits cannot be financed through a 2 percent contribution rate will the State receive any Federal grant. To the extent that its costs exceed 2 percent, it will still be required to finance one-fourth of the costs out of State funds.

In order, however, to avoid the possibility of a State permitting its fund to reach a precariously low condition in order to receive a Federal grant, the bill requires that as one of the conditions of eligibility that whenever a State's fund drops below 6 percent, it imposes a minimum rate of contribution of at least 1.2 percent.

Section 7 changes title IX of the Social Security Act and makes certain technical changes in section 904 in order to achieve consistency with the substantive amendments proposed by the bill.

Section 8 of the bill provides that the above provisions extending coverage and establishing benefit standards which must be met by State laws shall be effective as of July 1, 1960. This would give to the States sufficient time to make the necessary statutory changes in their State unemployment compensation laws before the standards become effective.

Third, the text of the bill itself:

A bill to provide for unemployment reinsurance grants to the States, to revise, extend, and improve the unemployment insurance program, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds that (1) the systems of unemployment compensation as now constituted and administered throughout the several States are failing to carry out the purposes and objectives of employment stabilization and security against unemployment which were sought to be achieved by the enactment of the Social Security Act of 1935; (2) there are substantial categories of workers and employees who, though needful of the benefits afforded by unemployment compensation are not covered for such benefits; (3) the amounts of unemployment compensation payable to unemployed persons who are covered are, in most cases, inadequate to provide the worker and his family with the basic necessities of life; and (4) there are great disparities between the States with respect to the terms and conditions under which workers may become eligible for unemployment compensation, as well as with respect to the amount of such compensation and the length of time for which it is paid. Therefore it is the purpose of the Congress, in order to achieve the goals of employment stabilization and security against unemployment, and in order to strengthen the economy and provide for the general welfare of the Nation, to extend to certain new categories of workers the benefits of unemployment compensation, to prescribe certain minimum standards with respect to the terms and conditions under which unemployment compensation will be paid, as well as to the amounts and the length of time for which such compensation will be payable, and to otherwise extend, revise, and improve the unemployment compensation program.

SEC. 2. Section 3304(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by adding after paragraph (5) the following new paragraphs:

"(6) the maximum weekly compensation payable under such law shall be an amount equal to at least two-thirds of the average weekly wage earned by employees within such State, such average to be computed by the State agency of such State on July 1, 1960, and on July 1 of each succeeding year on the basis of the wages, including amounts excluded therefrom under section 3306(b)(1), paid during the last full year for which necessary figures are available;

"(7) the weekly compensation payable to any individual shall be (A) the maximum weekly compensation payable under such law, or (B) an amount (exclusive of any compensation payable with respect to dependents) equal to at least one-half of such individual's average weekly wage as determined by the State agency, whichever is the lesser;

"(8) compensation shall not be denied to any eligible individual for any week of total unemployment during his benefit year by reason of exhaustion or reduction of benefit rights or cancellation of his wage credit, until he has been paid unemployment compensation for not less than 39 weeks during such year;

"(9) compensation shall not be denied in whole or in part to any otherwise eligible individual because of the receipt of any payment under any plan or system established for the purpose of supplementing the compensation payable under the State law; and

"(10) in order to be eligible to receive unemployment compensation benefits an individual shall not be required (A) if the State law provides for a qualifying requirement computed as a multiple of the amount of the individual's weekly unemployment compensation benefit, to have been paid, during his base period, more than 30 times the amount of his weekly unemployment compensation benefit; (B) if the State law provides for a qualifying requirement computed as a multiple of such individual's high quarter wages, to have been paid more than one and one-half times the amount of his high quarter wages; or (C) if the State law provides for a qualifying requirement based on weeks of employment, to have been employed by an employer for more than 20 weeks in his base period."

SEC. 3. (a) Subsection (a) of section 3306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) EMPLOYER.—For the purposes of this chapter the term 'employer' means any person who, at any time during the taxable year, has one or more individuals in employment."

(b) Section 3306 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(o) BENEFIT YEAR.—For the purposes of this chapter, the term 'benefit year' means the period prescribed by State law, but not in excess of 52 consecutive weeks, for which an eligible individual may receive weekly unemployment compensation benefits.

"(p) BASE PERIOD.—For the purposes of this chapter, the term 'base period' means the period prescribed by State law beginning not prior to the first day of the fifth full calendar quarter immediately preceding the beginning of the benefit year.

"(q) HIGH QUARTER WAGES.—For the purposes of this chapter, the term 'high quarter wages' means, in the case of any individual, the amount of wages (as defined by State law) paid to such individual in the calendar quarter of the base period for which his total wages were highest.

"(r) AVERAGE WEEKLY WAGE.—For the purposes of this chapter, the term 'average weekly wage' means, in the case of any individual, the amount of wages (as defined by State law) paid to such individual during the period used for determining his compensation for a week of total unemployment (1) in case the period used is the calendar quarter in which such individual was paid his high quarter wages, divided by 13; or (2) if some other period is used, divide by the number of weeks, during the period used, in which he performed services in employment (as defined by State law)."

SEC. 4: (a) Section 3302(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended to read as follows:

"(b) ADDITIONAL CREDIT.—In addition to the credit allowed under subsection (a), a taxpayer may credit against the tax imposed by section 3301 for any taxable year (1) an amount equal to the amount, if any, by which 2.7 percent exceeds the amount for which credit is allowed under subsection (a), if the contributions to a pooled fund required to be paid by him with respect to the taxable year are at a uniform rate imposed by State law on all employers, or (2) with respect to the unemployment compensation law of each State certified for the taxable year as provided in section 3303 (or with respect to any provisions thereof so certified), an amount equal to the amount, if any, by which the contributions required to be paid by him with respect to the taxable year were less than the contributions such taxpayer would have been required to pay if throughout the taxable year he had been subject under such State law to the highest rate applied thereunder in the taxable year to any person having individuals in his employ, or to a rate of 2.7 percent, whichever rate is lower."

(b) The first sentence of section 3303(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is amended by inserting "(2)" after "section 3302(b)".

UNEMPLOYMENT REINSURANCE

SEC. 5. Sections 301 and 302 of the Social Security Act, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT ACCOUNT

"SEC. 301. (a) There is hereby appropriated to the Federal Unemployment Account in the Unemployment Trust Fund for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each fiscal year thereafter, amounts equivalent to 100 per centum of the taxes (including interest, penalties, and additions to the taxes) received during such period under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act and covered into the Treasury. There is also authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Unemployment Tax Account such additional sums as may be required to carry out the purposes of this title.

"(b)(1) For the purposes of assisting the States in (A) the administration of their unemployment compensation laws (including administration pursuant to agreements under title IV of the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952), (B) the establishment and maintenance of a system of public employment offices in accordance with the provisions of the Act of June 3, 1933 (48 Stat. 113), as amended, and (C) carrying into effect section 602 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 there is hereby authorized to be expended, for payments to the States, from the Federal Unemployment Account in the Unemployment Trust Fund for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each fiscal year thereafter, sums not to exceed the amounts specified by Congress in the Appropriation Act or Acts for the Department of Labor for each such fiscal year.

"(2) In addition to the sums authorized to be expended under paragraph (1) of this subsection for the purpose of assisting the States in the administration of their employment compensation laws, there is hereby authorized to be expended from the Federal Unemployment Account for such purpose, as provided in section 302(a)(2), for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1960, and for each fiscal year thereafter, an amount not in excess of $25,000,000.

"(c) There is authorized to be expended from the Federal Unemployment Account for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1959, and for each fiscal year thereafter, a sum not to exceed the amounts specified by Congress in the Appropriation Act or Acts for the Department of Labor to be necessary for the administration by the Department of Labor of its functions under (1) the Federal Unemployment Tax Act, (2) this title and titles IX and XII of the Social Security Act, (3) the Act of June 6, 1933 (48 Stat. 113), as amended, (4) title IV (except section 602) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, and (5) title IV of the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952.

"PAYMENT TO STATES

"SEC. 302. (a)(1) The Secretary of Labor (hereafter referred to as the 'Secretary') shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to each State which has an unemployment compensation law approved by the Secretary under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act such amounts as the Secretary determines to be necessary for the proper and efficient administration of such law during the fiscal year for which such payment is made. The Secretary's determination shall be based on (A) the population of the State; (B) an estimate of the number of persons covered by the State law and of the cost of proper and efficient administration of such law; and (C) such other factors as the Secretary finds relevant. The Secretary shall not certify for payment under this subsection in any fiscal year a total amount in excess of the amount specified for such purpose in the Appropriation Act or Acts for the Department of Labor for such fiscal year.

"(2) If the Secretary determines that the amount specified in the Appropriation Act or Acts for the Department of Labor for the purpose of assisting the States in administering their unemployment compensation laws is, because of changes in economic conditions which were unforeseen at the time such amount was specified, less than the amount necessary for the proper and efficient administration of such laws, he is authorized to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to the States for the administration of their unemployment compensation laws, in addition to the amounts authorized to be certified under paragraph (1), amounts the total of which shall not exceed the amount authorized to be expended by section 301(b)(2).

"(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon receiving a certification under subsection (a), pay from the Federal Unemployment Account in the Unemployment Trust Fund, prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, in accordance with such certification."

SEC. 6. Sections 901, 902, and 903 of the Social Security Act are hereby repealed and the last sentence of section 904(b) is revised by striking out "section 1202(c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 1202(e)".

SEC. 7. Title XII of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE XII—GRANTS TO STATE UNEMPLOYMENT FUND

"SEC. 1201. (a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) and paragraph (3), a State shall be entitled to a reinsurance grant for any calendar quarter, commencing with the quarter beginning on July 1, 1960, if the balance in such State's unemployment fund on the last day of the preceding quarter is less than the amount of the compensation paid from such fund under the State unemployment compensation law during the 6 months' period ending on such last day.

"(2) A State shall not be entitled to a reinsurance grant for any calendar quarter commencing after the computation date for the first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1961, and prior to the computation date for the first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1966, if with respect to any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1961.

"(A) the balance in the State's unemployment fund on the computation date for such year was less than an amount equal to 6 per centum of the most recent annual taxable payroll or less than the amount of the compensation paid from such fund under the State unemployment compensation law during the 2 years immediately preceding such date, whichever amount is greater; and

"(B) the minimum rate of contribution required to be paid into the State fund during such taxable year was less than 1.2 per centum.

"(3) A State shall not be entitled to a reinsurance grant for any calendar quarter, commencing after the computation date for the first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1966, if with respect to any year within the five most recently completed taxable years—

"(A) the balance in the State's unemployment fund on the computation date for such year was less than an amount equal to 6 per centum of the most recent annual taxable payroll or less than the amount of the compensation paid from such fund under the State unemployment compensation law during the two years immediately preceding such date, whichever amount is greater; and

"(B) the minimum rate of contribution required to be paid into the State fund during such taxable year was less than 1.2 per centum.

"(4) A reinsurance grant shall be an amount estimated by the Secretary of Labor (hereafter referred to as the 'Secretary') to be equal to three-fourths of the excess of the compensation which will be payable under the provisions of the State unemployment compensation law during the calendar quarter for which such grant is made over 2 per centum of the taxable payroll for such quarter.

"(5) As used in this section, the term 'computation date' shall have the same meaning as when used in section 3303 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended.

"(b) The Secretary is authorized and directed, on application of a State agency, to make findings as to whether the conditions entitled a State to reinsurance grant provided for in subsection (a) hereof have been met; and if such conditions have been met, the Secretary is directed to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, the amount of such grant, reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any sum by which the Secretary finds that the amounts granted for any prior quarter were greater or less than the amounts to which the State was entitled for such quarter. The application of a State agency shall be made on such forms, and contain such information and data, fiscal and otherwise, concerning the operation and administration of the State law, as the Secretary deems necessary or relevant to the performance of his duties thereunder.

"(c) The Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon receiving a certification under subsection (b), make payment from the Federal Unemployment Account in the Unemployment Trust Fund, prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, in accordance with such certification.

"(d) All money paid to a State under this title shall be used solely for unemployment compensation benefits; and any money so paid which is not used for such purposes shall be returned to the Treasury and credited to the Federal Unemployment Account unless such State is eligible for a reinsurance grant.

"(e) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Federal Unemployment Account, as repayable advances (without interest), such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title."

SEC. 8. The amendments made by the preceding sections of this Act shall be effective as of July 1, 1960.

SEC. 9. This Act may be cited as the "Unemployment Compensation Act of 1959".

Fourth, a memorandum with six appendixes setting forth the background of the present demand for enactment of such uniform minimum standards as are provided in this bill:

BACKGROUND ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Public concern with shortcomings in the Federal-State unemployment insurance system in this recession has had two significant effects:

(a) It resulted in Federal intervention to extend duration, on a temporary basis only, during the last session of Congress, and

(b) It has brought about a wide area of public agreement that Congress should legislate Federal standards in the coming session.

Not since the enactment of the Social Security Act have so many circumstances combined to encourage the enactment of Federal benefit standards.

1. Until 1953, Congress expressed itself in terms of studies and reports on the performance of unemployment insurance (e.g., "Issues in Social Security," staff report prepared for the House Ways and Means Committee, January 17, 1946, and report of the Advisory Council on Social Security to the Senate Committee on Finance, 1949.) During this period, a wide area of agreement on the criteria of desirable unemployment insurance laws was achieved.

2. Beginning in 1954, the President adopted a policy of proclaiming these criteria or standards as the responsibility of State legislatures, and reiterated his recommendations each year (see attached app. A).

3. Federal intervention in 1958 (Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act) marked a basic change in public policy, based on the admitted failure of States to achieve the recommended standards without Federal help.

4. As a result of the recession, the Governors of many States are asking for Federal benefit standards (app. B). On December 5, the Democratic Party's Advisory Council on Legislation recommended Federal benefit standards. On November 19, Dr. Arthur Burns, former Economic Advisor to President Eisenhower, declared that Congress should liberalize unemployment insurance by permanent amendments in coverage, benefit amounts, and duration (app. C).

5. The Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security, appointed by the Secretary of Labor to advise on policy, recommended on December 4, 1958 (the first time in its history) specific Federal benefit standards (app. D). All public members and labor members united in the majority report; two employer members (one not present at final vote) favor some Federal standards.

6. This recommendation has gone to the Secretary of Labor, who has stated:

"It is my hope * * * that the Congress next year when it convenes will look at the whole problem of unemployment compensation, both in terms of duration and in terms of benefits, so that we can set at the Federal level a standard which the States could properly follow." (Speech to Bricklayers Convention, Atlantic City, N.J., Oct. 13–17.)

7. The Vice President has sensed the political importance of unemployment insurance improvements and asked for extending coverage to 12 million more workers and incorporation of temporary extensions into permanent law (app. E).

8. In Congress a great many Senators and Representatives want the opportunity to vote on an economic issue as clear-cut as improvement in unemployment insurance. At the time of election, 37 of the 47 new Congressmen and 10 of the 15 new Senators had part or all of their constituency classified as areas of substantial labor surplus (over 6 percent unemployed). In all constituencies, over 12 million people this year experienced unemployment and over 8 million had direct experience with unemployment insurance, many for the first time.

9. A straight Federal standards bill may be one of very few pieces of welfare legislation acceptable to the administration and to Congressmen who want a balanced budget and no inflationary pressures. (Such a bill requires no Federal appropriation and would probably take more funds out of the economy than it would pay out in benefits until the cyclical recession of 1962–63.)

These nine political and economic facts add up to the greatest opportunity for improving unemployment insurance in over 20 years.

APPENDIX A

EXCERPTS FROM THE PRESIDENT'S ECONOMIC REPORT, 1957

One set of proposals aimed at reinforcing the Federal-State system of unemployment insurance has resulted in important actions. During 1954, Congress extended the coverage of unemployment insurance to 1.4 million employees of firms with 4 to 7 persons on their payrolls and 2.5 million Federal civilian employees. In the last 3 years, 38 States have raised weekly benefits, 12 have lengthened the potential duration of benefit payments, and 4 have extended coverage to firms with less than 4 employees.

Additional improvements are needed. First, benefits are still inadequate in relation to wages. It is again suggested that the States raise the dollar maximums so that the great majority[1] of covered workers will be eligible for payments equal to at least half their regular earnings. Second, the duration of benefits is still inadequate in many States. It is again suggested that the States and Territories which have not yet done so lengthen the maximum term of benefits to 26 weeks for every person who qualifies for any benefit and remains unemployed that long. Third, important classes of workers are still not covered. It is recommended that the Congress extend unemployment insurance to the 1.8 million employees of firms with 1 to 3 persons on their payrolls who are still uncovered in many States, to ex-servicemen, and to employees in Puerto Rico. Also, the States are urged to include the 4.5 million persons who work for them for their political subdivisions.

Another problem requiring attention is the loss of income caused by temporary disabilities not related to the work of employees. For some years, four States have had insurance programs covering such contingencies, and many employers provide similar protection. A recommendation will again be presented to the Congress to provide temporary disability insurance benefits for employees in the District of Columbia. It is hoped that the States that have not as yet done so will take the necessary legislative steps to protect their workers against temporary off-the-job disabilities.

[1] The Bureau of Employment Security, Department of Labor, has since estimated that for the great majority to receive benefits equal to half their earnings, the maximum benefit must be set at 60 to 66⅔ percent of each State's average weekly wage.

APPENDIX B

STATE GOVERNORS SPEAK FOR FEDERAL STANDARDS IN UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On February 13, 11 Governors from States with 40 percent of the workers covered by unemployment insurance sent a telegram to President Eisenhower urging action on the recession. It stated, in part:

"A practical program to bolt the growing recession should include * * * establishment of minimum Federal standards for unemployment insurance benefits.

Gov. Robert Meyner, New Jersey; Gov. Averill Harriman, New York; Gov. Stephen L. R. McNichols, Colorado; Gov. Herschel C. Loveless, Iowa; Gov. Edmund S. Muskie, Maine; Gov. Foster Furcolo, Massachusetts; Gov. G. Mennen Williams, Michigan; Gov. Orville L. Freeman, Minnesota; Gov. Robert D. Holmes, Oregon; Gov. Dennis J. Roberts, Rhode Island; Gov. Albert D. Rosellini, Washington.

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, of New York, has declared himself for Federal benefit standards. The Rockefeller Brothers Report, issued in April 1958, states, in part:

"UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

"A second vitally important part of our social insurance structure—unemployment insurance—should be greatly strengthened by the extension of coverage, increase in benefits, and lengthening of their duration. Minimum Federal standards should be enacted to encourage this improvement. At the same time, State administration of the program should be strengthened by obtaining more skilled personnel, providing more specialized services, and establishing more cooperative and effective relationships with industry. Particular help should be given to middle-aged and older persons having difficulty finding jobs."

On December 6, 1958, Governor Williams reiterated his views on benefit standards:

"Unemployment compensation needs to be improved, and some kind of retraining program provided for those who are displaced by machines. I have come to the considered conclusion that we can never meet this problem exclusively at the State level. We must look to the Federal Government, to provide decent nationwide standards of unemployment compensation. Michigan cannot hope to provide these standards alone, as long as we are faced with the unfair competition of other States which are trying to attract industry with low wages and low standards of job insurance."

The Detroit AFL–CIO merger convention said:

"The unemployment compensation system is designed not only for the protection of the laid-off worker, but also as the Nation's first line of defense against depression. It will never fully serve either purpose until the Federal administration stops addressing fruitless exhortations to the State legislatures, and puts a floor of Federal standards under the job insurance systems of every State. I'm sick and tired of getting letters from the President of the United States, urging the legislatures to do something about this. I think it's high time the President did something at the Federal level—and if he doesn't, I think the new Congress should, and will."

On January 13, 1959, Governor Meyner in his annual message to the New Jersey Legislature explained the need for Federal standards in unemployment insurance:

"One difficult aspect of this subject is the unfair competitive condition fostered by the failure of the Federal Government to provide any kind of minimum standards for all States. Here, the Federal Government, having initiated the program on a basis calling for State administration, has wholly failed to prevent some of the States from adopting programs so inadequate as to be almost meaningless. Such programs, of course, cost little, and this fact has been used to entice industry to those States. This activity, in turn, creates local unemployment in areas where realistic programs have been put into effect, causing severe drains upon their resources.

"A single State, by itself, is powerless to legislate in any effective way to cure this condition. We should press for Federal action so that we can carry our own program forward."

APPENDIX C

[From Daily Labor Report, Nov. 19, 1958]

FORMER PRESIDENTIAL ADVISER ADVOCATES MORE LIBERAL JOBLESS INSURANCE SYSTEM

The former Chairman of President Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers, Arthur Burns, in a Washington, D.C., speech, declares "the most useful step that we can take in the near future" to strengthen the automatic stabilizers of the economy "is to liberalize our unemployment insurance system.

"This year the Congress responded to urgent demands by extending the duration of unemployment benefits. However, this legislation was of a temporary character, it failed to embrace all of the States and it did not deal with the matter of coverage or the size of the benefits. It would hardly be wise to wait for another recession before we again tackle the problem of unemployment insurance. A reform, I think, is long overdue. The benefits provided for insured workers are inadequate in many States. The maximum weekly benefit represents 50 percent or more of the average weekly wages of insured workers in only six States. The duration of benefits is 26 weeks or longer for all eligible claimants in only seven States. More serious still, about 13 million workers are entirely excluded from the protection of unemployment insurance. Now that our economy is once more expanding, we are in a position to proceed deliberately and to carry out permanent improvements in unemployment insurance, not only with a view to mitigating individual hardships, but also with the objective of increasing the resistance of our economy to a future recession.

"Once we succeed in devising a system of insurance that is comprehensive in coverage and tolerably suited in its scale of benefits to the needs of the unemployed in a modern economy, we should be in a position to deal with the difficulties of recession in a calmer atmosphere than existed early this year. Our situation would be better still if we could devise a politically acceptable means of automatically varying tax rates with the ups and downs of economic activity."

APPENDIX D

FEDERAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON EMPLOYMENT SECURITY RECOMMENDS STANDARDS

At its meeting on December 3, the Federal Advisory Council recommended the following Federal standards in unemployment insurance. (All public and labor members supported this report. One employer member filed his own statement advocating some standards. Another employer member not present at the final vote also favors standards.)

"1. The great majority of covered workers, as recommended by the President, should be eligible to receive as unemployment benefits at least one-half of their regular weekly earnings. In order that the great majority may get this amount, the States will need to provide for a maximum weekly benefit amount equal to no less than 66⅔ percent of the statewide covered average weekly wage.

"It is recommended that this provision be implemented in 3 stages: for the first 2 years following the effective date of the provision the maximum weekly benefit should not be less than 50 percent of the average weekly wages of workers in the State covered by the State unemployment insurance law; for the next 2 years not less than 60 percent; and after that not less than 66⅔ percent.

"2. Unemployment benefits for at least 30 weeks during a 1-year period should be uniformly provided for all claimants who remain unemployed for that long and are otherwise eligible for benefits.

"3. No State should require more than 20 weeks of employment during the claimant's qualifying year for eligibility for benefits. It is recognized that evidence of substantial attachment to the labor force should be required to justify the duration provision proposed. It is believed that 20 weeks is an adequate test. We therefore recommend that not more than 20 weeks of work should be required as an eligibility test.

"4. The offset against the Federal tax should be reduced from 2.7 percent to 1.7 percent for employers in those States which do not meet the above-mentioned conditions. As in the past, those States that meet the Federal conditions shall continue to have an offset of 2.7 percent. Those States which fail to comply shall be permitted an offset of 1.7 percent. It is not the intention of this recommendation to raise additional revenues but rather to remedy serious deficiencies in the present system. Moreover, in the event that any revenues do accrue because of failure of a State or States to meet Federal conditions, these funds should be added to the amount of the Federal loan fund."

APPENDIX E

NIXON SEES POLITICAL IMPORTANCE OF IMPROVING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

A dynamic and growing economy is bound to cause hardships to some of the people involved in the process of change. As new businesses come into being and others grow, some will be replaced. And in a free economy we must expect readjustments from time to time—such as the one through which we are passing at present. These occurrences will mean temporary unemployment for some American workers.

With these facts in mind, consideration should be given to instituting permanent reforms in our system of unemployment insurance.

Specifically, to the extent feasible, the 12 million workers not now covered should be brought under our unemployment compensation system.

The prolongation of benefit periods now in effect as a temporary measure should be made permanent.

The Federal and State Governments should work together toward the objective of establishing higher minimum standards for the level of benefits, their duration, and their coverage.

These proposals are sound not only for reasons of plain humanity, but also because the flow of income provided by more adequate unemployment compensation serves to cushion the impact of the business cycle. The faster we carry out this basic reform, the greater can be our assurance that occasional setbacks in economic activity, such as are bound to occur, will remain brief and mild. APPENDIX F

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S BUDGET MESSAGE CALLS FOR HIGHER UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION STANDARDS

In his budget message of January 19, 1959, the President said:

"Our unemployment compensation system has again demonstrated its importance in providing income for the unemployed and thereby supporting the economy while alleviating hardship. Temporary assistance of the kind provided by the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 is in no sense a substitute for widening the coverage of unemployment compensation and extending the duration of benefits and increasing benefit amounts under the Federal-State system. I have many times urged such action. I urge it again now with added conviction as a result of last year's experience."

(The weekly benefit amount contained in this proposed uniform minimum standards bill are the same as those urged by the administration for several years.)

My colleague and working partner, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ] will, I believe, in the course of his remarks present for the RECORD certain other material that will be helpful to Members and the American people in considering this vital matter.

Let me conclude with this word:

We of the Committee on Ways and Means who sat through the 1958 hearings on unemployment compensation, both during consideration of the temporary unemployment compensation bill and, late in the session, proposals such as this bill for permanent improvement in the Federal-State system itself, were, and, I believe, are now convinced that these uniform minimum standards are many years overdue. We have too long been persuaded by counsels of timidity and fear into acquiescing in chronic malnutrition of our people and our economy. It is time for us to pick up our bed and walk.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION BENEFITS

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include the 12 exhibits therein referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, today in the minds of hundreds of thousands of workers who are unemployed and other millions of workers now at work, the bill to establish certain additional minimum standards of unemployment compensation carries a top priority tag.

This bill, sponsored by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN], by myself and at least 121 Members of both parties in this House, and a similar one sponsored by 31 members of the other body, would mean an increase of $19 in weekly benefits paid an unemployed worker receiving the average Michigan weekly wage and would extend benefits 19 weeks beyond the present potential duration of 20 weeks. Over a period of 39 weeks of unemployment, it would mean an increase in benefits for such a worker of $1,311 in high velocity purchasing power.

If in 1958 the Congress had enacted such standards, it would have meant a net increase of $1,011 over the amount to which such a worker was entitled under both the State unemployment compensation law and 10 additional weeks of benefits provided by the Federal Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958, due to expire April 1, 1959.

In a moment I propose to put in the RECORD a table showing the net loss sustained by the average worker in each State because of the lack of benefit standards provided in this bill. Overall, the loss of benefits, of high velocity purchasing power, amounts to $1,344,800,000. Without the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act, the loss would have been $392,400,000 greater, or $1,737,200,000.

As an example of what is being done to workers, to their families and to business in the great many labor surplus areas all over this country, I want first to cite figures for the city of Detroit showing how inadequate weekly unemployment compensation benefits are, both in amount and duration.

TABLE I.—Relief data for the city of Detroit, 1956–58

	1956	1957	1958
Number of families receiving direct relief in December	5,585	7,471	16,007
Number of screening interviews, year [1]	41,548	37,700	64,324
Key reasons for applying for relief:
Unemployment benefits exhausted	6,916	3,328	16,692
Unemployment compensation benefits not adequate	1,612	936	3,744
Separated from job and not entitled to unemployment compensation benefits	7,696	7,488	10,764

[1] Years ended Jan. 11, 1957, Jan. 10, 1958, and Jan. 9, 1959.

NOTE.—Annual figures on number of applicants interviewed who were seeking welfare aid and their reasons for seeking relief are weekly average figures for the annual periods indicated projected on annual basis. The figures may cover some families whose breadwinner was interviewed more than once in the same year.

Source: Detroit Public Welfare Department.

I have here a table showing certain relief data for the city of Detroit for the years 1956, 1957, and 1958. This table, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, shows these two shocking facts:

First. From 1956 through 1958 the number of families applying for direct relief in Detroit, because unemployment compensation benefits they were receiving were not adequate, was four times as high in 1958 as in 1957, totaling 936 in 1957, and rising to 3,744 in 1958.

Second. The number of families applying for relief because their unemployment compensation benefits had been exhausted rose from 3,328 in 1957 to 16,692 in 1958, an increase of five times.

Again to emphasize the inadequacy of unemployment compensation benefit payments, using the city of Detroit as an example, I ask unanimous consent to insert another table showing the distribution of Government surplus commodities in the city of Detroit in October 1958, compared with October 1957.

This table shows that in 1957 in Detroit, 860 families whose breadwinner received unemployment compensation simultaneously qualified to receive surplus commodities averaging about $25 a month because compensation payments were so low and that 1 year later, in October 1958, the number of such families had increased to 14,862.

The table also shows that, although no family whose breadwinner was "temporarily unemployed" in 1957 qualified to receive Government surplus commodities, 1 year later in October 1958, 3,637 families whose breadwinner was "temporarily unemployed" qualified to receive such commodities. This classification of "temporarily unemployed" appears to include persons who were not covered by unemployment insurance.

In October 1958, 233,644 persons in 62,714 Detroit families received surplus commodities, 4 times as many as a year ago.

TABLE II.—Distribution of Government surplus commodities, city of Detroit, October 1958 compared with October 1957

	October 1957	October 1958
Number of families serviced	[1] 19,117	[1] 62,714
Number of persons serviced	61,764	232,644
Means of support of families receiving surplus:
Welfare relief	3,652	8,089
Unemployment compensation	860	14,862
Low income	2,658	20,443
Temporarily unemployed	0	3,637
Aid to dependent children	7,152	8,716
Other means of support	4,800	6,960

[1] Welfare department estimates surplus commodity costs at about $25 per month for each family. At this rate cost of such commodities would have totaled $478,000 in October 1957 and $1,568,000 in October 1958.

[2] Estimated from figures published by source.

Again, as an example of inadequacy of present duration of benefit payments, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD tables III and IV, which show for selected Michigan labor market areas, first, the totals for the years 1956, 1957, and 1958, of claimants exhausting unemployment-compensation benefits before being reemployed, and, second, a comparison for the month of December in the years 1956, 1957, and 1958.

Table III shows that 91,458 Michigan workers exhausted their benefit rights in 1956 before being reemployed, 76,897 in 1957, and 251,999 in 1958. Of this 1958 total, 107,020 also exhausted their extended benefit rights under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a table marked "Table 5" showing by States the cost to the average unemployed worker of not having the minimum benefit standards provided in this bill. It will be noted for certain States, such as New York, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, that the loss for the average unemployed worker—that is the worker receiving the average wage in the State—was zero or relatively small. But even in these States, for workers paid more than the average wage, there was an individual cash loss. And in these States further improvement in benefit standards was retarded by threats of competition offered by other States having smaller weekly amounts and shorter duration.

[2] In these cases unemployed workers earning an amount equal to the State's average weekly wage would not have benefited from Federal standards. But unemployed workers earning more than the average would have benefited from Federal standards because their benefit amount under the standard (col. 3) would have been higher than that indicated for the average worker.

As has been stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN], this bill is not offered as an instant cure for the chronic economic chills-and-fever which is weakening our country and our people when we need all our health, all our strength in human and material terms, more than every before in our history.

A whole kit of measures are urgently needed to put idle men, machines, and money back to work, to get back to full employment and full production, and to see to it that this recovery is accomplished, not on a blind boom-and-bust cyclical swing through inflation and deflation, but on the sound basis of a stable steadily expanding economy and a rising standard of living for all our people.

Enactment of this bill stands high on this list of measures needed to implement the moral commitment made by Congress in enacting the Employment Act of 1946 and in providing funds for its administration.

It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have to provide for some extension of the temporary unemployment compensation bill which is now due to expire April 1, 1959. Continuance may provide extension of benefits for several thousand unemployed workers and their families who will have exhausted all their rights under State unemployment compensation laws. For example, in Michigan, such exhaustions may amount to 5,000 unemployed workers a week.

But such extension, if made, must not be allowed to become a substitute for action on this substantial and permanent improvement in the entire Federal-State unemployment compensation system.

With all the good will and hard work of which the 86th Congress and the American people are capable in the next 2 years, large-scale unemployment is all too likely to continue to be a major problem.

The steady advance of technology, including automation, the practice of large corporations in the steel, automobile, and other industries in raising prices on the pretext that such increases are required by such wage increases as unions are able to win by collective bargaining all combine to throw the economy out of balance. Within the up-and-down curves of the recurrent boom-and-bust cycle we now see a steady and stubborn growth in continuing mass unemployment.

In 1 year, from December 1957 to December 1958, automobile production by General Motors and Ford increased by 60,000 units. But, against the 60,000 production gain there was an absolute decline in employment in these 2 corporations by 33,400 workers. Throughout the Nation, employment in the auto industry averaged 620,000 workers in 1958, or 165,000 fewer persons than the average in 1957, and 190,000 fewer than in 1956.

This sickness in our economy, this inability of American farmers and wage earners to buy back fair shares of the potential abundance of foods, fibers, and manufactured goods that they are able to produce in increasing volume year after year, does more than weaken us now. It tends to waste the lives not only of adult Americans of this generation but to blight the lives of the next generation, since the poverty, the insecurity, and the anxiety of the parents tends to mark their children for life.

During the past 20 years, the ceiling payments allowed under State laws have failed to move upward at the same rate as wages. The result in all States, barring none, is that the maximum benefit allowance as a percentage of wage levels is today only a fraction of what it was in 1939.

The median or middle State, in 1939, had a maximum benefit of 65 percent of its average weekly wage.

The median State today has a maximum benefit of only 44 percent of its average weekly wage.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point table VI, showing how benefits have fallen behind wages since 1939.

This bill would reestablish the median maximum level of 1939 and it would raise the present maximums in all States to 66⅔ percent of average weekly wages in each State.

But the dollar amount in each State would be different and would depend on general wage levels. Furthermore, by stating the maximum as a percentage in each State instead of a fixed dollar amount, this bill would prevent any future deterioration in the adequacy of maximum benefit amounts.

The State-by-State downgrading of the maximum benefit amounts can be seen from the following table, which I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point and which is marked as table VII:

	Maximum weekly benefit as a percentage of average weekly wages
	1958	1939

It should be clearly understood that there is no intent in this bill to pay high maximums to all claimants or even to most claimants.

In fact, the intent is to do just the opposite. In no case will this bill force State programs to pay to any individual claimant more than half of his individual weekly wage.

The effect of higher maximums is simply to allow this formula of 50 percent of individual benefits to operate over a wider range. The only unemployed who will be entitled to the new maximums are those who make a weekly wage of twice the new maximum benefit amounts. They and everyone making lower weekly earnings would receive in benefits only half of their individual weekly wages. Those wage earners earning more than twice the maximum amounts would be restrained by the maximum to less than half of their weekly wage.

It will be clear by now that the major effect of the benefit provisions of this bill is to restore unemployment insurance as a wage-related program, rather than the fixed-benefit program which it has become in so many States because of low maximum benefit amounts.

The following table, marked table VIII, which under unanimous consent I insert at this point, shows what percentage of claimants State by State now receive the maximum and therefore do not receive one-half of their own individual weekly wage:

In the beginning, it was not known what the cost of unemployment insurance would be and the benefit durations were intentionally so low until further information on the cost and experience of duration amounts would be available. Some States liberalized their duration requirements, always provided the unemployed claimant is able and available for work and seeking suitable employment.

There is such great variability in the potential duration of benefits among the different States that we now have a crazy-quilt pattern of varying degrees of inadequacy, as shown by congressional action to help extend the duration of benefits during the current recession.

Florida and Virginia allow no more than 16 and 18 weeks potential duration only to the most fortunate claimants with the average potential duration even less.

Pennsylvania, on the other hand, allows in its regular State unemployment compensation program, 30 weeks potential duration to those who continue to seek work.

The recent experience with duration of benefits and exhaustions is summed up in the following table, which under unanimous consent I insert in the RECORD at this point as table IX.

One result of the gradual change of unemployment compensation from a wage-related to a flat-benefit program has been steady reduction in the cost of the program to far below its originally intended cost. Whether the average costs are expressed as percentages of the taxable wage base or of the total wage base, this change is significant and dramatic. The wage base in most States is the first $3,000 of earnings, which used to be most of payrolls but is now only 65 to 70 percent of payrolls. So the more accurate indication of the gradual cheapening of unemployment insurance is the average employer tax as a percentage of total wages, as shown in the following table, marked "Table X," which, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD at this point:

TABLE X.—Average employer contribution rate expressed as a percent of taxable wages and of total wages, 1938–57

It should, of course, be understood that the cost of unemployment insurance at present levels varies greatly as between States, depending on the economy of the State and the impact of slumps on the industries of a particular State.

In general, however, the cost of the program has been low enough that most States have stayed within the original tax limits set under Federal law.

The following table, table XI, which under unanimous consent I ask to insert in the RECORD at this point, shows the average tax rates State by State for 1957 and 1958:

These figures do not represent the actual cost of benefits paid out, but rather the average tax rate that each particular State has deemed desirable, given the reserves and experience in recent years. In other words, it is an approximation of the longrun cost of the program in each State as affected by reserve requirements.

During our hearings on Federal standards last year, the Bureau of Employment Security estimated the cost of the benefit standards in this bill as about 50 percent more than the cost of the present unemployment compensation program.

Raising the tax rates 50 percent more than those in existence in the last 2 years still would leave unemployment insurance in nearly all States running less than the 2.7 percent maximum still in the Federal law.

In those circumstances where the cost of benefits is running over 2 percent in a particular State at a particular time, this bill provides for reinsurance grants to be paid in an amount of three-fourths of 1 percent of that cost over 2 percent of taxable payrolls.

Any State with adequate financing and low reserves would be eligible for this reinsurance grant, which would be paid from the three-tenths of 1 percent of taxable payroll that now goes for administrative costs and reinsurance loans.

In talking about average tax rates in each State, we should not forget that experience rating, which is not a Federal requirement for offsets from the 2.7 percent of taxable payrolls, operates to produce different rates for each employer.

To those who object to Federal standards we should point out that experience rating is a Federal standard in a negative sense of permitting States to cut tax rates after cutting benefits below 50 percent of wages. In other words, we have in the present law a strong negative financing standard but no benefit standards.

The effect of experience rating on the tax rates in each State is indicated in the following table, table XII, which shows how many companies are in different tax categories.

It is significant to note that, in 13 States, experience rating has been carried so far as to exempt many employers. In one case, 94 percent of all employers eligible for rate modification are at a zero rate. In other words, they pay nothing toward the cost of unemployment insurance benefits. These employers pay only the three-tenths of 1 percent administrative costs to the U.S. Treasury. It should also be noted that a large proportion of all employers in many States pay taxes amounting to less than 1 percent of taxable payrolls. Under unanimous consent I insert the following table in the RECORD at this point:

[6] Less than 0.05 percent.
[7] When reduced rates are assigned in Washington, the rate variations are achieved through the use of tax credit offsets. Employer accounts in this State are classified by rate for current rate year on the assumption that each employer's taxable payroll would remain the same as in the preceding year.

In general, we must conclude that unemployment insurance is a cheaper program than was intended. The average national rate of only 1.4 percent of taxable payrolls or nine-tenths of 1 percent of taxable payrolls is only 2 cents per hour or considerably less than the cost of their fringe items that up-to-date employers include in employee compensation.

This bill would allow States greater freedom in the financing of their programs. A number of States have had difficulty with the operation of experience or merit rating and would like more latitude. This bill would allow a State to establish uniform rate reductions, if it so wished.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we who believe that enactment of this bill is not only a matter of social justice but also a wise action to strengthen our economy for the long hard pull ahead, are of the opinion that we cannot afford the costs to our society and to our economy of a cheap program of unemployment compensation. We cannot afford benefit amounts so inadequate in amount and duration that they must be supplemented and followed by relief payments. We cannot afford such damage to the families of workers able and willing to work but unemployed through no fault of their own. We cannot afford such sags in purchasing power and the volume of business in our local communities, our State, and the Nation as a whole. We cannot afford the backing up of inventories, the layoffs, the unpaid bills, the evictions, the empty houses, stores, and offices that flow in evil sequence from such contraction of workers' incomes and that can be retarded by more nearly adequate unemployment compensation benefits. By acting together in this Congress, as the Constitution intended, we can do together what no one of us, no one State, can afford to do separately. We can afford to be humanly decent to our fellow men; we can afford to be economically wise. Thereby we can serve our country well in this sector of what must be a broad effort to implement the Employment Act of 1946.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION FEDERAL STANDARDS BILL

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to join with a number of my distinguished colleagues in presenting an unemployment compensation Federal standards bill to extend and improve our present Federal-State unemployment compensation system.

Although our Nation's economy and industrial output has achieved prerecession levels, there are still many breadwinners and heads of families who for reasons beyond their control are still without jobs and without any form of sustenance.

Some of these have exhausted their regular unemployment compensation benefits; others have exhausted the benefits for the extended 13-week period under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act passed last spring; still others have received no unemployment compensation at all because they were not covered or were determined to be ineligible under the unreasonable terms and conditions for eligibility imposed by the States in which they live.

As the program now operates, benefits range all the way from $7 a week in some States to $70 as in the new State of Alaska and the period for jobless payments runs the gamut from as little as 5 weeks to 45 weekly payments, while only one out of every four persons employed today are not covered at all.

The enactment of Federal minimum standards both with respect to the amount and duration of unemployment compensation payments is long overdue and I earnestly trust that the bipartisan sponsorship of this measure bespeaks the prudence as well as the urgency of immediate favorable consideration.

FLOOD DAMAGE

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOK] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, last week I toured the flooded areas of my district, the 11th Ohio District, and wish to report my observations to the Members of the House.

As I toured stricken areas I was amazed at the extent of the flood damage. Each of the five counties in my district was damaged by last week's heavy rains and resulting floodwaters. Several of the counties suffered primarily from an excess of water which led to flooding in their streets and in the basements of their homes, but in the remaining three counties, similar conditions were worsened by rivers, in each of the counties, overflowing their banks and causing tremendous damage to the surrounding countryside and, in one instance, the loss of five lives.

In western Lake County the Chagrin River overflowed its banks from Willoughby Hills, through Willoughby, to the river's mouth at Eastlake. As a result, five died as hundreds were forced to leave their homes. Damage will run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

In Trumbull County the residents along the Mahoning River suffered the worst flood since 1913. Damage in that county alone has been estimated as high as $10 million. Before the Mahoning River subsided to below flood level, 2,500 people had been evacuated from their homes.

Also, in Lake County and in the neighboring counties of Ashtabula and Trumbull, the Grand River left its banks and caused great damage in Painesville and Madison in Lake County, Windsor, and Orwell in Ashtabula County, and Bloomfield Township in northern Trumbull County. Once again, hundreds of families were forced to evacuate their homes and great property damage resulted to these communities.

As I toured the flood areas I heard over and over again of the wonderful and heroic job done by thousands of workers, some Government employees but most of them volunteers, as they evacuated flood victims from their homes and furnished them with the necessities of life until such time as they could return to their family homes once again. All of these groups deserve public commendation for their fine work in a true emergency.

I especially call to the attention of the House the fact that two members of the civil defense unit of Lake County, Hamilton Schwitzer and Raymond Kifer, lost their lives in the floodwaters of the Chagrin River, seeking to save others from that same fate.

Under unanimous consent I include the following article from the Painesville Telegraph of Friday, January 23, 1959:

THEY GAVE THEIR LIVES HELPING OTHERS

We pay tribute to the memories of the two men who gave their lives in an attempt to save three other persons from the swirling, raging waters of the Chagrin River.

These men, Raymond Kifer and Hamilton Schwitzer, both civil defense volunteers of Willoughby Hills, made heroic efforts to help their friends in time of danger.

When the boat they and a family of three were in capsized, all five were swept to death in the ice-clogged swollen stream. Witnesses told of the victims clinging to branches and logs for 20 long minutes before the bitter cold became too much and all five were washed away.

There were other acts of heroism as scores of volunteers helped rescue hundreds of persons along the Chagrin River that dark Wednesday night. But the bravery and courage of these two men will go down in Lake County history.

Also, as I toured flood areas in the city of Warren, I heard much praise for Lake Milton and Berlin Dam Reservoirs and the great help they had been in preventing even greater damage from flooding Mahoning River. The Mosquito Reservoir was also credited with having lessened floodwaters for Youngstown and surrounding areas.

In this time of emergency the facilities already installed for flood control in this area of northeastern Ohio demonstrated their value as they held back billions of gallons of water which would have made conditions much worse.

But the present facilities are not adequate to deal with the flood problem in northeast Ohio. Further action must be taken to prevent such floods as occurred last week. While eventual construction of the West Branch Reservoir will provide additional controls on the Mahoning River, flood control programs should be initiated to harness the Chagrin and Grand Rivers. Otherwise, these rivers will cause great damage over and over again in the future.

I respectfully call upon the Congress to give favorable consideration to necessary measures to control such flood conditions in northern Ohio and elsewhere. Money spent for this purpose will be returned many-fold in the years to come by the saving of human life and the elimination of property damage caused by floods.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOK. I yield.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I commend my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOK] for painting a very sad and very graphic picture of the flood disaster in his district. I assure the gentleman I appreciate the difficulties suffered by his people. I have a deep feeling for them, and I know that every Member of this House joins me in that feeling.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOK] for yielding the floor to me today in order that I might say a word concerning the worst calamity that has befallen the good people of my congressional district in many decades. It is my privilege to represent the 17th Ohio District, which includes the counties of Ashland, Holmes, Richland, Knox, Coshocton, Delaware, and Licking. The counties and towns within the district which suffered most in this disaster are Newark, Mount Vernon, Mansfield, Shelby, Bellville, Butler, Delaware, Fredericktown, Utica, and St. Louisville.

I am, of course, referring to the flash flood in Ohio on Wednesday, January 21, which came about as the result of heavy concentration of snow and rain on frozen ground.

I want to say a word on why this catastrophy occurred, how it could have been avoided, and also a word, now that it has happened, on what is presently being done to restore order to rehabilitate the people involved and to minimize human suffering to the greatest possible extent, and, Mr. Speaker, what is even more important, what I trust will be done in the future to forever insure against the recurrence of such a calamity.

On Thursday last I made a personal inspection of the area most heavily devastated by this onslaught of water. Nature is usually no respecter of persons but I most regretfully report that in this instance, certainly in the Mount Vernon area, the flood hit those individuals hardest who could least afford to be hit at all. In Licking County alone, of which Newark is the county seat, two human lives were lost and many sustained major injuries. At least 1,300 homes were damaged with 26 destroyed completely. I am told that damages in dollars and cents will amount to more than $10 million. The American Red Cross, which incidentally along with civil defense workers, National Guard, and countless individuals has rendered heroic service throughout the area I visited, reports that more than 1,500 families in Newark were affected; that this agency fed some 6,000 people, including 1,000 emergency workers.

In Knox County more than 1,000 families suffered heavily from the impact of the flood; at Mount Vernon raging waters flowed over and through the dikes of the Koskosing River and flooded approximately one-third of the city necessitating evacuation of some 3,500 persons to emergency shelters. Damages to the local Continental Can Co. is estimated at more than half a million dollars. Red Cross disaster costs, I am told, will exceed $175,000. The school officials advise flood damage to public school property will total $73,000.

This flood has added to the grief of hundreds of families in the west and south end of Mount Vernon already in distress by reason of unemployment occasioned by a strike at the local Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. plant dating back to October of last year.

Mr. Speaker, I saw homes which had been built on weekends over a period of years by those who could not afford to hire a carpenter, wiped out in a matter of minutes. It was the worst spectacle of devastation I have ever witnessed outside a theater of war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a sad story but the real tragedy lies in the fact that it could have been averted.

The hard fact is that it should not have happened.

The grief of the disaster in Mount Vernon could have been avoided had we been able to contain the waters of the Kokosing for a matter of some 2 hours. For more than 10 years interested citizens of the Mount Vernon area, including Fredericktown, and involving city and county officials, have tried to get the Federal Government to conduct a flood-control survey of the Kokosing River and its tributaries. In 1956 it was learned that funds had been appropriated by the Congress to enable the Corps of Engineers to make this survey, and while we know that such a survey has been in the works, while it is clear that the Army Engineers have been apprised of the need of flood-control measures in this area, I regret to say that not even a report of the survey has been made to this date.

Now it goes without saying the people in my district, whom I have the honor to represent, have been for years and are still wondering why.

Although I have been advised by the Corps of Engineers that a survey report is forthcoming and that recommended operations will be instituted at the earliest possible date, the situation requires action now. At this time in midwinter, the disaster I have just referred to could well be repeated from even a slight rainfall.

I trust further the Army Engineers will promptly complete the study on the advisability of flood-control work on the Black Fort of the Mohican River which was scheduled for completion in June 1957, more than 2 years ago. Improvement of this stream would have prevented extensive damage to the city of Shelby in Richland County.

To paraphrase a statement of the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS], I say with all the resources of the United States and with all of the engineering skill that we possess, there is no reason why the people of this area should suffer recurring inundation and hardship.

A happy note to add in this report is that Coshocton County had comparatively little damage during this flood and this was due primarily to the existence of the Mohawk Dam constructed upstream in the Muskingum Conservancy District, a true monument to men of vision and a real example of sound economy in terms of life, limb, and property.

Mr. Speaker, before leaving Washington last Thursday I contacted the White House and the Washington Office of Small Business Administration anticipating that many of my people would be interested in direct relief and disaster loans for rehabilitation and reconstruction purposes. I was advised at that time by the Deputy Administrator, Mr. Albert C. Kelly that officials of the regional office in Cleveland would without delay make the necessary preliminary survey, estimate the amount of damage and the extent of need. He also stated that temporary arrangements for office space would be made in the district wherever necessary and that following this, as fast as the needs developed, as many people as were required to process applications would be sent into the respective areas to carry on the work.

I was pleased when the Deputy Administrator told me that applications for the disaster loans could be approved in the field offices and with emphasis upon the fact that time is of the essence. I am sure there are many in my district who are anxiously waiting to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded them by the law administered by Small Business Administration to gain a new lease on life and become readjusted and productive citizens at the earliest possible date.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOK. I yield.

Mr. BOW. The gentleman has brought to the attention of the House a very important matter today, the floods that have occurred in the State of Ohio. In Stark County I think we have had about $20 million of damage. Tuscarawas County has had $5 million, and we had some damage in Wayne County.

I hope that the gentleman and his colleagues on his side of the aisle will join with us on my side of the aisle in doing everything possible to prevent future catastrophes of this kind. I hope we will give careful consideration to a continuation and proposed enlargement of the Muskingum Conservancy District. I am very proud of the Muskingum Conservancy District which headquarters in my congressional district, for over the years they have been building these control dams, and I think if it had not been for the Muskingum Conservancy District the damage and loss in Ohio would have been millions, and millions, and millions of dollars more than it is today.

I should like to point out that in the Muskingum Conservancy District there are great lakes so fine for recreational purposes in summer, an area where forests are now growing and we have a productive and profitable forestry service. But note this, even the lakes, the ground under the lakes, that forms the bed of the lakes, pays taxes. It is not a typical flood control operation such as we hear so much about in the House of Representatives, but the entire conservancy district pays taxes back to the people of Ohio the same as though the ground were actually being used for farming purposes.

I hope that in our consideration of this matter in trying to do something we will be careful we do not bypass the conservancy district program which has proven so well. Those of you who have served in the State legislatures deserve much credit for the building up of that conservancy district in the State of Ohio. You have the same thing in the Miami Conservancy District. We join with you gentlemen in hoping that something will be done.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] has suffered serious damage in his district. Only a few weeks ago, as a gentleman said here the other day, the Army Engineers in passing upon a report for him said that no flood could occur in his district for at least a hundred years. At this time his plants and industries have been flooded out and the damage is perhaps not able to be figured out as yet.

We had the same controversy here in the last few years about Dillon Dam. Finally, through the efforts of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HENDERSON] the Dillon Dam has been authorized. It is going to go forward and it will be part of the conservancy district there. I feel that if the Dillon Dam had been built, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEVERING] would have saved some of the loss he had.

So this is a matter, I think, we should all join in, particularly having in mind the conservancy districts where the whole burden is not put on the Federal Government and where we join with the State in cooperation with the Engineers and with the conservancy district to go forward and make sure that in your districts and in mine these things will not be repeated.

I thank the gentleman from Ohio for bringing this matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. COOK. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for his remarks.

I might add the same applies to the west branch of the Mahoning Reservoir. If we could have had that years ago we would have avoided a tremendous amount of damage in the city of Warren.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. I want to thank the gentleman from the 11th District of Ohio [Mr. COOK] for calling the attention of Congress to the extensive flood damage in Ohio, which suffered a great loss of life and property damage. Although my district is among those communities in Ohio which suffered no flood damage, we are concerned with the problems of our fellow citizens. In these days the loss of life and property is inexcusable and unnecessary as far as flood damage is concerned. Flood damage and the resultant loss in life and property are the proximate result of inadequate public expenditures to control and hold back threatening floodwaters. Pennypinching in flood control programs has resulted in irreparable loss of life and property.

In my State of Ohio there are strong and powerful groups which have opposed broad-scale Federal programs. They disregard the fact that over 273 millions of Federal dollars have been spent in Ohio for flood control and navigation aids, as follows:

Up to the year 1948, $183 million have been spent.

Between 1948 and 1955, $63,396,000 have been spent.

In the year 1956, $9,614,000 have been spent.

In 1957, $16,450,000 have been spent.

And a comparable amount for the year 1958.

The total estimated cost of all presently authorized Federal flood control work in Ohio totals $417,501,600. The estimated cost of completing these approved projects will require appropriations totaling $333,851,000 at current price levels. If this work must be eventually done to make Ohio a flood-free State, the problem should be realistically faced without further delay.

I am certain that the millions of Federal dollars that have been spent in Ohio for the control of floods have saved at least 10 times their total in property damage alone, not counting the many lives that have also been saved.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, as we study our current budgetary problems we must dedicate our efforts to the elimination of waste; but we must also exercise proper care and caution to avoid short term savings in Federal expenditures at the expense of long term losses.

Mr. COOK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOK. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WOLF. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOK], that the people of northeast Iowa, myself included, and the people of all Iowa, sympathize greatly with the tragedy that has happened in Ohio. We have had our floods too, very tragic, in recent months, that have caused a considerable loss of life and a considerable loss of property.

I commend the gentlemen for his presentation and his proposal, and I am sure that it will receive very serious study by this Congress.

Mr. COOK. I thank the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to commend the gentleman from Ohio for bringing to the attention of Congress this situation. Year in and year out we are faced with the same problems in flood control. Year after year the Army Engineers are confronted with not having enough money to take care of the many worthwhile flood-control projects. We are "pennywise and dollar foolish." The Engineers should be given adequate funds to carry on with the necessary flood-control program that is so badly needed. In my district last week we suffered a million and a half dollars damage. The Army Engineers have been most cooperative and helpful but because of lack of funds they can only do so much. I hope this Congress will be more generous in this connection. It is my hope that we can get another omnibus flood control bill through both Houses and get a Presidential signature.

Mr. COOK. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COOK. I yield.

Mr. BOW. I would like to say that it came to my attention the other day from one of the committees of the Congress that it has been estimated—and this not flood control but reclamation, which we consider somewhat in the same category—that since the adoption of the Marshall plan for foreign aid there has been more money spent on reclamation abroad under those plans, good American taxpayers' dollars, than has been spent in the United States since the founding of the Republic. Now, it seems to me that it is about time we began to think about some of these things here in the United States. I join the gentleman in the hope that in connection with projects which have to do with the protection of our own people that we see to it that there is adequate money, even though we take it away from foreign aid funds, which I have tried to do for many years. But, it seems to me that this is something that we should consider when we think of the fact that more money is spent on reclamation in foreign aid funds, since the Marshall plan, than has been spent on reclamation in this country since the founding of the Republic. I hope this, too, as the gentleman said he hopes, that we get a good flood control bill, a bill that will receive a Presidential signature. And, I hope that when the Congress passes a bill, it passes a bill based upon the needs of the people, and for proper flood control, and take care of the people, and that we do not put in so many things that are not necessary simply to try to satisfy people in various districts and that we confine it to the needs and the benefits of the people rather than the possible political expediency of individuals. In that way we will get a Presidential signature for the needs of the people.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COOK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. May I say, first of all, in connection with loss of lives and property damage year in and year out, that the Congressmen in the districts where these projects are under consideration certainly know their districts and know what their districts need. "Pork barreling," as far as I am concerned, is an election word used by some individuals. I am not in agreement with any individual who tries to help himself or alleviate himself politically. I am interested first of all in saving lives and saving property and not for benefits affecting a certain individual.

Mr. COOK. I thank the gentleman.

DEFENSE FACILITIES PROTECTION ACT OF 1959

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COAD). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHERER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill which, if eventually passed, will be known as the Defense Facilities Protection Act of 1959. A similar bill was introduced by Senator BUTLER in 1957. The bill would authorize the Federal Government to guard strategic defense facilities against individuals believed to be disposed to Communist acts of sabotage, espionage, or other subversion.

As stated in the bill:

The history of modern warfare has established that the defense of any country is greatly dependent upon the effective and continued operation of its industrial economy and the full utilization of its productive capabilities. In time of war or of preparation for defense from attack by a potential aggressor, injury to the industrial economy or impairment of the productive capabilities of a country may severely curtail its military effectiveness, and such injury or impairment has become a major objective of aggressor nations in their preparation for and prosecution of war.

The Department of Defense for a number of years has urged the adoption of legislation by the Congress as proposed in my bill.

Mr. Tyler Port, Director of the Office of Security Policy, Office of the Secretary of Defense, and four other officials from the Department of Defense, testified before our Committee on Un-American Activities in behalf of this legislation. Their testimony and the testimony of numerous other witnesses indicating the necessity of this legislation to protect the internal security of this Nation, particularly in communications facilities, appear in the printed hearings before the Committee on Un-American Activities. The publications of the committee of these hearings are entitled "Investigation of Communist Penetration of Communications Facilities, Part 1 and Part 2."

The chief purpose of the hearings of the Committee on Un-American Activities in this field of Communist access to defense facilities was to test the adequacy of existing law in furtherance of the duty of the committee to maintain a continuous watchfulness over internal security laws. The testimony of all of the witnesses from the Pentagon and the communications industry was to the effect that notwithstanding Communist access to defense facilities, there is no violation of the present law.

Here, for example, is an excerpt of the testimony given before the committee several months ago by A. Tyler Port, Director of the Office of Security Policy, Office of the Secretary of Defense:

Mr. ARENS. Is the record clear, gentlemen, that the Defense Establishment is of the judgment that present law is inadequate to cope with the problem of Communists and their access to the vital communications facilities of the Defense Department?

Mr. PORT. That is correct, Mr. Arens. I might say, if I may, that as the speed, range, and complexity of our modern weapons systems advance, our communications system on a global basis become increasingly vital to modern military operations.

Here are some further excerpts from the testimony, Mr. Speaker:

Paul Goldsborough, staff director, Communications Division, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense—Supply and Logistics—testified that there is a potential possibility of sabotage of communications facilities which process defense messages by any "subversive element that might be so minded."

Michael Mignon, a representative of the Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO, testified that he had formerly been a member of the Communist Party of the United States. Mr. Mignon pointed out the importance that the Communist Party places upon control of the communications industry in times of emergency. He stated:

To the best of my recollection, sir, it was always pointed out to me that the importance of obtaining control of the communications industry in times of stress or in revolutionary times was a primary factor, and therefore the efforts of the Communist Party in subsidizing the union and offering whatever assistance they could in building the union in the communications industry was primarily the main objective.

Mark Anthony Solga, employed as a radio operator by the Radio Corp. of America, testified before the committee that he had also been a member of the Communist Party. When asked whether he believed that the employment of Communists in the communications industry constituted a serious menace to the security of the United State, Mr. Solga stated:

Potentially, I honestly believe that it does. In the event of any further conflict between the East and West, as that tension increases during the so-called cold war, if it should ultimately develop to a stage where it becomes rather hot, then I do honestly believe they are in a potentially dangerous position to inflict harm on our national security.

Samuel Rothbaum, who is employed as an assistant repeater chief by the Western Union Telegraph Co., testified that he had been a member of the Communist Party and that, in his opinion, based upon 22 years of experience in the communications industry, a saboteur could inflict "an awful lot of damage" in time of crisis.

Mrs. Concetta Padovani Greenberg, who has been employed by the Western Union Telegraph Co. since 1927, also appeared as a friendly witness during the course of the hearings. She testified that she had been a member of the Communist Party for a period of years. When questioned regarding the possibility of access to confidential and coded messages by members of the Communist Party, Mrs. Greenberg testified that persons known to her as having been members of the Communist Party do have access to confidential messages transmitted over facilities of certain segments of the communications industry. She stated that she has seen confidential messages relating to the tests made upon the atomic and hydrogen bombs.

In order to complete the record, may I insert here other testimony on this subject taken in the past before the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate. May I say that the reason Mr. Arens' name appears in both the hearings of the House and of the Senate is that until about 2 years ago when he became staff director of the Committee on Un-American Activities, he was staff director of the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate.

In 1951 the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate conducted a series of hearings respecting subversive infiltration in the telegraph industry. Here are excerpts from the testimony in those hearings:

Mr. ARENS. Do the defense departments of the United States Government lease any wires from Western Union which go through New York?

Mr. MITCHELL. They do.

Mr. ARENS. Do the other departments of the Government of the United States, which deal with problems of defense and defense production, lease wires which go through New York?

Mr. MITCHELL. They do.

Mr. ARENS. Those are leased from the Western Union Co.?

Mr. SHUTE. Some of them.

Mr. ARENS. Are the messages which go over those wires subject to monitoring by ACA people?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes, they are.

Mr. ARENS. Then am I clear in our interpretation of what you are saying that information which is transmitted by the defense facilities of this Government is available to the monitoring process or otherwise to the employees represented by the American Communications Association?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes.

Mr. ARENS. Is that information on the leased wires available to the stewards who are appointed by the officials of the American Communications Association?

Mr. WILCOX. It is possible; yes.

Mr. ARENS. Why do you qualify it as being possible?

Mr. WILCOX. In the sense that it may not be always the steward that is monitoring that particular circuit, but if he did, why, of course, it would be available to him.

Mr. SHUTE. Not all stewards have access to monitoring facilities.

Mr. WILCOX. It is only the particular stewards who might represent the technicians in that particular section of the industry.

Mr. WATERS. But the opportunity is there.

Mr. WILCOX. But the opportunity is there.

Mr. ARENS. May I ask this question here, to pose a hypothetical case. Let us assume that an official in the Pentagon, who is concerned with the armament problems of a North Atlantic Pact nation, sends a cable over a leased wire from Washington by New York on to the Atlantic Pact nation respecting armament problems; would that cable or the information contained therein be subject to monitoring in New York by a person who is a member of the American Communications Association?

Mr. WILCOX. The answer is "Yes."

Mr. ARENS. What is your appraisal of that, as a man who has had vast experience in the communications field, from the standpoint of the security interest of this Nation?

Mr. WILCOX. I think it is extremely hazardous.

Mr. ARENS. Why?

Mr. WILCOX. Well, if such a person had subversive tendencies, they could monitor such information. I don't know whether he might have access to the code or whatever else he might have—he could pass it on to whom he might wish. There is a potential danger there, as I see it.

Mr. ARENS. Am I clear in my interpretation of your testimony that the defense agencies of this Government do have leased wires going through New York City?

Mr. SHUTE. That is correct.

Mr. ARENS. And those leased wires are serviced by employees of the Western Union Co., who are members of the American Communications Association?

Mr. WILCOX. That is correct.

Mr. ARENS. Which has been ejected from the CIO because of its promoting the purposes of the Communist Party?

Mr. WILCOX. That is correct.

Now, these people have access to traffic moving over some 450 leased circuits and 250 telemeter channels terminating at New York City that are also susceptible to monitoring. By telemeter channel I might explain that is a method Western Union has developed for, say, splitting what is normally termed a channel into various segments so that the one channel can be used by a number of different customers.

Mr. ARENS. Would you pause there a minute? I want to ask you another question. Is the company empowered to discharge an employee solely because that employee is a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. WILCOX. No. In fact, we would be guilty of several things if we tried it, I am afraid.

Mr. ARENS. Am I clear in my impression from your testimony that the company was obliged to bargain with the American Communications Association?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes; they very emphatically were.

* * * * *

Mr. ARENS. Have you, in the course of your employment during the period of time you were in ACA and in the Communist Party, had occasion to see restricted messages?

Mrs. YEWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENS. Could you tell us about them?

Mrs. YEWELL. The last restricted message that I saw was about a movement of rubber. The first word of the message, which was a Government message, was "restricted." To myself, I didn't think that message had any right even on Western Union's wires. It gave the number of the cars, the destination, and the name of the railroad. It was a long tabulated message about this rubber and its movement.

Mr. ARENS. Have you also, Mrs. Yewell, while you were a member of the Communist Party and a member of the American Communications Association in the course of your work with the Western Union, seen messages on production?

Mrs. YEWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ARENS. Were they restricted, too?

Mrs. YEWELL. They did not have the word "restricted."

Mr. ARENS. What did they have on them?

Mrs. YEWELL. Different defense companies saying reasons why they couldn't fill orders. We have all the messages coming through with an assigned number, DO number.

In April 1955 Secretary of the Army Wilber Brucker, who was then Counsel to the Army, appeared before the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate. Here are excerpts from his testimony:

Mr. ARENS. Are you aware of the fact that the tie lines and leased lines out at the Pentagon at this very hour are serviced by the American Communications Association which has been repeatedly found to be a Communist-controlled organization?

Mr. BRUCKER. I see your point and I am very glad that you raised that. Yes, and we are disturbed.

Mr. ARENS. Is there any way, Governor, that the Defense Department could preclude access under existing law, preclude access to the tie lines and leased lines out at the Pentagon to persons in the American Communications Association, a Communist-dominated organization?

Mr. BRUCKER. I know of none.

Mr. ARENS. In other words, at the present time, although the tie lines and leased lines out at the Pentagon are serviced by a Communist-controlled organization, the Defense Department is, under existing law, helpless to protect itself?

Mr. BRUCKER. To that extent it certainly is.

Mr. ARENS. Are you cognizant of the fact that there has been testimony before the Internal Security Subcommittee to the effect that persons under discipline of the Communists controlling the American Communications Association now have access to messages coming from the Pentagon by a monitor system whereby they can plug in, listen to conversations——

Mr. BRUCKER. Regrettably, yes, I know that.

Mr. ARENS. Are you conversant with the facts which have been revealed by the Internal Security Subcomittee of the Senate to the effect that restricted telegrams coming in from the Pentagon have been intercepted by persons under discipline of the Communist-controlled American Communications Association?

Mr. BRUCKER. I am aware of that.

Mr. ARENS. Are you conversant with the fact that the North Atlantic cable which carries very important messages vital to the security of our Nation is now serviced by the American Communications Association, a Communist-controlled labor organization?

Mr. BRUCKER. I have learned that, too.

Mr. ARENS. And I take it, if I am not being a little bit redundant here, that under the present law and under the present powers vested in the Defense Department, the Defense Department is absolutely helpless to cut off that access to the messages?

Mr. BRUCKER. That is correct.

Senator BUTLER. As is every other agency of Government that you know of?

Mr. BRUCKER. That is right, every other agency.

Mr. ARENS. Would you propose, Governor, if this bill should become law, that steps would be taken as soon as possible to preclude access to the tie lines and leased lines out at the Pentagon and to the North Atlantic cable of persons under discipline of the Communist-controlled American Communications Association?

Mr. BRUCKER. I would certainly anticipate that steps would be taken to get at that precise problem.

Mr. ARENS. Governor, are you at all conversant with the general, not the specific, the general technique of trying to break a code, one nation trying to break the secret code of another nation?

Mr. BRUCKER. Yes; I am.

Mr. ARENS. You know, of course, do you not, Governor, that one of the techniques of trying to break a code is to have access to messages involved in sending that code; is not that correct?

Mr. BRUCKER. That is.

Mr. ARENS. Is it not true that coded messages of the Pentagon, highly confidential coded messages of the Pentagon which go out over the tie lines and leased lines serviced by the Communist-controlled American Communications Association are in such situation or status that they can be available by a monitoring system even though in code to persons under discipline of the Communist-controlled American Communications Association?

Mr. BRUCKER. You have described it correctly.

Mr. ARENS. And do you, as the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, who has access to the security information of the Department of Defense, feel that that condition, that situation, is a large or at least a situation of grave concern to this Government?

Mr. BRUCKER. I feel, sir, that that situation is nothing short of deplorable to be allowed to continue any longer than is absolutely necessary.

Senator BUTLER. And, Governor, in addition to the existing situation so far as monitoring is concerned, those people are always there to sabotage those very important communication lines, aren't they?

Mr. BRUCKER. They are, and while I would not describe or give any information of an unclassified nature, I know a place or places where that could occur with disastrous results.

Senator BUTLER. In other words, you have a double threat that is presently right here at this moment?

Mr. BRUCKER. That is right.

Senator BUTLER. Breaking the code through the frequency of messages obtainable by them or to which they have access, and also the chance of sabotage of these very important communications in the event of emergency?

Mr. BRUCKER. Yes, sir.

Here is an excerpt of testimony during these same hearings from a representative of the Pentagon:

Mr. STOHL. The ways and means employed by a saboteur to inflict damage are as varied as human imagination. However, when such talents are exercised against vital areas of facilities considered highly essential to our Nation's defense, the loss can be as serious as a major military reverse. The employment of known Communists in this type of facility enhances the possibilities of sabotage. Common sense dictates the removal of such individuals from these plants.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say the following:

1. It is not now, nor has it ever been, the purpose of the bill, nor the intention of the Department of Defense to enter into a program of nationwide screening. The intent is to remove a relatively few known dangerous persons from a relatively small number of our most vital facilities.

2. I want to assure this committee that this problem has been considered over a number of years in the executive branch of the Government at the highest levels. Each time, over this period of years, the conclusion has been reached that our security program is not adequate so long as we are aware of the fact that hundreds of known Communists are in our most vital industrial facilities without legal authority to remove them.

3. Unless this legislation is enacted, we are not in a position to assure the Congress and the American people that all reasonable measures are being undertaken to safeguard our national security.

Senator BUTLER. Thank you, Mr. Stohl.

The well-known, able, and respected columnist Victor Riesel discussed the need for this legislation within the last 10 days. Here is what he said:

It would cost us $100 million to make a Soviet-type moon shot, Pentagon scientists, afflicted with a bad case of budget-itis, tell you in awe. By comparison, a big missile is dirt cheap, just $35 million, though one twisted wire or one badly-soldered electronic part can burn up before it gets higher than the commanding officer's temper.

Yet, despite the high cost of lifting one of these celestial gadgets, this Government has been forced to permit some 2,000 known Communists and professional saboteurs to work in classified plants which turn out parts and assemble component sections of missiles for the big race.

For well over a year the Pentagon has been seeking the power to get these workers fired—or at least shifted completely out of the secret plants. They told the House Un-American Activities Committee about it in detailed testimony.

That was on October 9, 1957. On that day, five top Pentagon counterintelligence and security officers went up the Hill. They are all respected men. They said there were 2,000 known saboteurs. They warned that they could not guarantee adequate protection against industrial espionage and sabotage. To make this record solid, here are the men who testified: A. Tyler Port, Director, Office of Security Policy; Robert Applegate, Staff Director, Industrial Security Programs Division; Paul Goldsborough, Staff Director, Communications Division; John H. Fanning, then Director of Domestic Programs; and Jack L. Stempler, Assistant General Counsel of the Office of the Secretary of Defense.

Port said: "Acts of sabotage and espionage are usually committed by an individual or several individuals, rather than by an organization. Consequently, any preventive or corrective measures taken should be directed against such misguided persons and not necessarily against organizations to which they belong."

The Pentagon simply wanted a law which could move some 2,000 identified potential saboteurs not only from a secret department but from the factory itself. At the moment, the Pentagon can only lift a suspect out of a classified division. It cannot, for example, get a janitor fired even if he is a known member of the Communist Party. That's a fact.

A proposed law was written. It was called the Defense Facilities Protection Act. No one heeded the House Un-American Activities Committee. The bill died. Committee member GORDON SCHERER, Cincinnati, finally reported on the floor of the House the other day the estimate of 2,000 potential spies, but it was lost in the torrent of words from others. * * *

Just one 10-cent phone call would have revealed that the Pentagon has spent millions tracing these workers.

Operating through its industrial security program, the Pentagon has checked upward of 3 million workers on a front ranging from the palm trees of the Florida coast to the ice-bound ships now part of the Arctic distant early warning system.

Of these, 2 million have been cleared for confidential information. Another 750,000 workers were cleared for top secret and secret data. There were 3,459 suspect cases at the time of the last count. Of these, clearances were denied or revoked in 1,006 cases. But it was all wasted. Many were just shifted to other floors and departments. The law doesn't permit us to do any more. Now that's a handy crowd to have around gadgets costing $35 million each.

The text of the bill follows:

A bill to authorize the Federal Government to guard strategic defense facilities against individuals believed to be disposed to commit acts of sabotage, espionage, or other subversion

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Defense Facilities Protection Act of 1959."

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) the history of modern warfare has established that the defense of any country is greatly dependent upon the effective and continued operation of its industrial economy and the full utilization of its productive capabilities. In time of war or of preparation for defense from attack by a potential aggressor, injury to the industrial economy or impairment of the productive capabilities of a country may severely curtail its military effectiveness, and such injury or impairment has become a major objective of aggressor nations in their preparation for and prosecution of war;

(2) there exists in the United States a limited number of individuals as to whom there is reasonable ground to believe they may engage in sabotage of the industrial economy and productive capabilities of the United States, espionage, or other subversive acts in order to weaken the power and ability of the United States to cope with actual or threatened war, invasion, insurrection, subversive activity, disturbance, or threatened disturbance of international relations;

(3) in such circumstances it is essential that, without impairing the rights or privileges of the great bulk of loyal United States citizens, such individuals be barred from access to facilities injury to which would be harmful to the industrial economy and productive capabilities of the United States, and, therefore, to its military effectiveness.

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the President finds by proclamation or Executive order that the security of the United States is endangered by reason of actual or threatened war, or invasion, or insurrection, or subversive activity, or of disturbance or threatened disturbance of the international relations of the United States, the President is authorized to institute such measures and issue such rules and regulations as may be necessary to bar from access to any defense facility or facilities individuals as to whom there is reasonable ground to believe they may engage in sabotage, espionage, or other subversive acts. The President may perform any function vested in him by this Act through or with the aid of such officers or agencies as he may designate.

(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, no measure instituted, or rule or regulation issued, pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall operate to deprive any individual of access to any defense facility or facilities unless such individual shall first have been notified of the charges against him and given an adequate opportunity to defend himself against the charges. Such charges shall be sufficiently specific to permit the individual to respond to them, and such opportunity shall, if the individual so desires, include a hearing. The Administrative Procedure Act shall not be applicable to proceedings under this Act. Nothing contained in this Act shall be deemed to require any investigatory organization of the United States Government to disclose its informants or other information which in its judgment would endanger its investigatory activity: Provided, however, That in the event that such information is not disclosed the individual charged shall be furnished with a fair summary of the information in support of the charges against him.

(c) The measures instituted, or rules or regulations issued, pursuant to subsection (a) hereof may operate to bar summarily any individual from access to any defense facility or facilities provided that such individual shall be notified in writing of the charges against him within fifteen days from the time he is so barred and given an adequate opportunity to defend himself against such charges, including, if he so requests, a hearing within thirty days of the date of such request. Reasonable continuances may, however, be permitted if consistent with expeditious disposition of the matter. A determination shall be made and transmitted to the individual affected within thirty days from the date of the termination of the hearing or, if no hearing is requested, of the submission of the individual's defense to the charges, and if administrative proceedings are provided by the rules or regulations for review of any such determination they shall be promptly determined. In the event that the summary bar against such individual is removed as a result of any proceeding, the individual shall be compensated by the United States solely for his loss of earnings in or in connection with any defense facility during the period he was so barred.

(d) As used in this Act the term "defense facility" shall have the same meaning as it has in title I of the Internal Security Act of 1950, as amended, but shall not include vessels, piers, or waterfront facilities.

SEC. 4. Whoever willfully violates any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to the provisions of this Act, or knowingly obstructs or interferes with the exercise of any power conferred by this Act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 5. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to deprive any individual of any rights or benefits conferred upon him by the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, an unprecedented crisis has arisen in some of the Nation's school districts. In an effort to circumvent the orders of State and Federal courts and in defiance of the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution, State and local officials have taken it upon themselves to close certain public schools. It is hard to believe that, in the middle of the 20th century, public schools in the greatest democracy on earth are actually being closed and instruction halted. But this tragedy is indeed unfolding before an astonished Nation and a startled world and indications are that the nightmare will spread still further before these unfortunate children are returned to their classrooms. It is now reported that closed schools in one of the areas will reopen. Nevertheless, boys and girls have been without any educational opportunities for months. Other schools are still closed. Therefore, I am today introducing legislation to provide these children with public education until the local authorities see fit to assume their responsibilities and reopen the local schools.

Mr. Speaker, all citizens of this Nation have a right to an education, wherever they live and whomever they might be. The Federal Government has already, and rightly, assumed responsibility for the education of children living on military reservations. But as has already been suggested by my distinguished colleague from Ohio, this is no longer a sufficient expression of the Federal responsibility.

Therefore, I am introducing two bills today designed to get these children back into public schools. The first of these bills amends Public Law 874 of the 81st Congress by providing that the United States Commissioner of Education shall establish and operate free public schools for the education of children whose schools are closed in order to avoid compliance with the 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The bill provides for the procedures which the Commissioner is to follow, the type of education to be provided and to whom.

Thousands of schoolchildren in the United States are not going to school. The date of the reopening of their school is uncertain, at best. "The education of our children is of national concern, and if they are not educated properly, it is a national calamity."

A related problem is the hateful, despicable and intolerable series of bombings of public schools which has occurred in recent months. These criminal acts may very well become—if they have not already—a concerted and cynical master plan designed to thwart or intimidate the peaceful compliance with court orders affecting public schools. Localities which endeavor to abide by the law are the ones most likely to be victimized by these vicious bombings. The Federal Government should demonstrate to them that it stands ready to assist them in the speedy restoration of their school facilities. Accordingly, the second bill which I am introducing today amends Public Law 815 of the 81st Congress by providing that the Federal Government undertake to construct minimum school facilities in an area where the existing facilities have been maliciously destroyed, in whole or in substantial part. The local educational agency will eventually repay the Federal Government for this construction in such manner as the U.S. Commissioner of Education deems appropriate without imposing an undue financial burden on the local educational agency. The bill further provides that the use of such a facility shall never be discontinued in an effort to avoid compliance with a State or Federal court order enforcing the 14th amendment to the Constitution.

Our richest national resource is our children, yet there are thousands of them being deprived of their right to a free public education, at a time when we can ill afford to squander any of our talents or resources. We must meet this challenge in a courageous and creative manner.

TO PASS A SOUND LABOR REFORM BILL

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced some revisions to my proposed Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 which provides for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, and for other purposes.

On January 15 I announced my intention to offer such revisions or amendments to the bill which I originally introduced on the opening day of this session, January 7.

The following three provisions are among those included in the revised version of the bill:

First. Provisions are made for holding National Labor Relations Board hearings prior to union representation elections. This will expedite union representation procedure and will offer another safety measure to keep corrupt elements for being able to win collective-bargaining rights for honest but unsuspecting workers.

Second. The National Labor Relations Act requirement for union officers to sign a non-Communist oath is repealed in my proposal because such a requirement is considered to be strictly a negative approach to assuring that only loyal Americans advance to union leadership posts.

Third. Persons convicted of serious crimes are prohibited from service as union officers or employees, unless they were convicted while a minor, or unless they have been approved by a U.S. district court, after proper hearings, to hold offices in or be employed by a labor organization. Court approval could not be given until at least 5 years after the termination of the last conviction.

I would like to point out to my colleagues that my proposed bill is similar to the one introduced in the Senate by Senators KENNEDY and ERVIN, except with reference to the revisions which I have just enumerated above. All other revisions made in my original bill are in line with the Kennedy-Ervin labor-reform proposals.

The first two revisions to my proposed measure—provision for preelection hearings by the National Labor Relations Board and repeal of the non-Communist oath—are not in the Kennedy-Ervin bill; and whereas the Senate bill would require the Secretary of Labor to approve for union offices or employment such persons as were convicted of serious crimes, my revised bill would allow approval by judicial process, that is, through a Federal court. Such an arrangement would keep the Department of Labor, which has several major functions under this bill, from being overloaded. It is also my considered opinion that more expeditious action would ensue by means of court procedure. In addition to this, my bill would not prohibit from service as a union officer or employee any person convicted of a crime while a minor. This provision is not found in the Senate bill.

The following major points are the same in both bills:

First. Comprehensive and detailed disclosure of union financial data;

Second. Reports by union officers on conflict-of-interest transactions;

Third. Criminal sanctions for embezzlement of union funds, false reporting, false entries on books, failure to report, or destruction of union books;

Fourth. Suits by union members for recovery of funds embezzled or misappropriated by union officers;

Fifth. Prohibition of loans by employers or unions to union officers;

Sixth. Secret ballot election of all union officers or of the convention delegates who select them;

Seventh. Due notice of all union elections, and real opportunity to nominate opposing candidates;

Eighth. Secret ballot election of union officers every 4 years by international unions and every 3 years by local unions;

Ninth. Prohibition of the use of union funds to support the candidacy of any union officer;

Tenth. Empower the Secretary of Labor to institute court action to set aside improper elections and conduct new elections;

Eleventh. Strict standards for the imposition of trusteeships and a limit of 18 months on their duration;

Twelfth. Mandatory annual reports to the Department of Labor and to union members on every trusteeship with the reasons for its establishment, continuance, and operation;

Thirteenth. Prohibition on counting votes of delegates of trustee bodies unless such delegates are elected by secret ballot, and on transfer of funds from trusteed local unions to internationals except normal dues and assessments;

Fourteenth. Empower the Secretary of Labor to begin court proceedings to break improper trusteeships;

Fifteenth. Prohibition of picketing for extortion or to secure a payoff from employer;

Sixteenth. Prohibition of solicitation or payment of fictitious fees for unloading cargo from interstate carriers;

Seventeenth. Public financial reports of the operating of Nathan Shefferman-type middlemen; and a prohibition of channeling bribes and improper influence through such middlemen; and Eighteenth. Elimination of the "no-man's-land" problem which denied NLRB action on local labor racketeering by directing the NLRB to exercise its full jurisdiction under the Taft-Hartley Act.

I introduced this legislation as a result of my being deeply disturbed and much concerned with specific accounts of corrupt practices in labor and management activities. The reforms in my proposals are sought by those—both in and out of Congress—who recognize the necessity for Federal legislation in the field of labor-management relations. I realize, however, that there are some individuals and organizations which oppose such anticorruption legislation because what they really want is another legislation.

It has been clearly shown through congressional and other investigations and hearings that corruption in labor-management relations is real, not fancied, and constitutes a malignant growth in the sinews of both labor and management.

I therefore urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this labor reform bill because we can no longer stand idly by and watch the lethal corruption disease gnaw away at the foundations and principles of labor and mangement, and consequently at the hard core of our economy and our democracy.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. HERLONG (at the request of Mr. SIKES), for 1 hour, on Monday next.

Mr. SIKES, for 30 minutes, on Thursday next.

Mr. VANIK, for 1 hour, on February 2.

Mr. MAGNUSON, for 20 minutes, on February 2.

Mr. MACK of Washington, for 15 minutes, on Thursday next.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. WRIGHT (at the request of Mr. MCGOVERN) and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. SLACK.
Mr. WAMPLER and to include extraneous matter.
Mr. MACHROWICZ and to include extraneous matter.
Mr. VANIK.
Mr. COLLIER and to include extraneous matter.
Mr. HOEVEN.
Mr. CRAMER to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances.
Mr. DELANEY.
(At the request of Mr. HALLECK, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)
Mr. TEAGUE of California.
Mr. KNOX.
(At the request of Mr. ALBERT, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)
Mr. HECHLER.
Mr. ANFUSO.
Mr. BLATNIK.
Mr. HOLTZMAN.
Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey (at the request of Mr. WOLF) and to include extraneous matter.
(At the request of Mr. Bow, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)
Mr. RAY.
Mr. ARENDS.
Mr. AYRES.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 11 minutes p.m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, February 2, 1959, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

442. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audits of the Federal Housing Administration, Housing and Home Finance Agency, for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1954 to 1957 (H. Doc. No. 61); to the Committee on Government Operations and ordered to be printed.

443. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to provide a revolving fund for certain loans by the Secretary of Agriculture for improved budget and accounting procedures, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Agriculture.

444. A letter from the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, transmitting the Fourth Annual Report of the Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program from August 2, 1954, through December 31, 1957, pursuant to the Housing Act of 1954; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

445. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting the Annual Report of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1958, pursuant to the act approved June 11, 1878 (20 Stat. 108); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

446. A letter from the president, Potomac Electric Power Co., transmitting a copy of the balance sheet of Potomac Electric Power Co. as of December 31, 1958, pursuant to the act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 974); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

447. A letter from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill providing further safeguards against improper practices in labor organizations and in labor-management relations; requiring disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and their officers and agents and reports of direct and indirect dealings between them and employers which may conflict with obligations as employee representatives; reinforcing rights of members of labor organizations with respect to funds and property, the election and removal of officers, and the exercise by other labor organizations of supervisory control, of such organizations; providing penalties for certain criminal acts; and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

448. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to authorize the Civil Aeronautics Board to include in certificates of public convenience and necessity limitations on the type and extent of service authorized, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

449. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to authorize elimination of a hearing in certain cases under section 408"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

450. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to authorize the imposition of civil penalties in certain cases; and to increase the monetary amount of fines for violation of the criminal provisions"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

451. A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 in order to (1) assure for the Civil Aeronautics Board independent participation and representation in court proceedings, (2) provide for review of nonhearing Board determinations in the courts of appeals, and (3) clarify present provisions concerning the time for seeking judicial review"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

452. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Power Commission, transmitting the 38th Annual Report of the Federal Power Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

453. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend section 30(a) of the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, as amended (30 U.S.C. 187(a)), to prevent the undesirable division of oil and gas leaseholds"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

454. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, relative to a proposed concession contract with Mr. Floyd L. Thompson, authorizing him to obtain hot waters from Hot Springs National Park, Ark., pursuant to the act of July 14, 1956 (70 Stat. 543); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

455. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill for the relief of Dr. Raymond A. Vonderlehr and certain other officers of the Public Health Service"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

456. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Civil Service Commission, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such act, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

457. A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting the General Services Administration report on positions compensated under authority of Public Law 623, 84th Congress, during calendar year 1958; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 20. Resolution to provide for the expenses of the investigation and study authorized by House Resolution 19; with amendment (Rept. No. 13). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 36. Resolution providing a clerk for the House delegation of the United States Group of the North Atlantic Treaty Parliamentarians' Conference; without amendment (Rept. No. 14). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 82. Resolution to provide funds for the expenses of the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by House Resolution 81; with amendment (Rept. No. 15). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 79. Resolution to provide funds for the expenses of the investigations and studies authorized by House Resolution 78; without amendment (Rept. No. 16). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 92. Resolution to provide funds for the Committee on the Judiciary; with amendment (Rept. No. 17). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 107. Resolution to provide funds for the expenses of the studies, investigations, and inquiries authorized by House Resolution 91; without amendment (Rept. No. 18). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 108. Resolution providing for the expenses of conducting studies and investigations authorized by rule XI(8) incurred by the Committee on Government Operations; with amendment (Rept. No. 19). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 126. Resolution to provide for the expenses of the investigation and study authorized by House Resolution 101; with amendment (Rept. No. 20). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 131. Resolution providing funds for the Committee on House Administration; without amendment (Rept. No. 21). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 136. Resolution to provide funds for investigations and studies conducted pursuant to House Resolution 56, by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; without amendment (Rept. No. 22). Ordered to be printed.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Liberalization of the Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER HOLTZMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing in the House of Representatives legislation which will provide for some liberalization of the Social Security Act.

The bill is a package bill, and provides for three major changes in the act.

The first revision is the removal of the present limitation of $1,200 per annum on outside income that can be earned by those individuals who are receiving social security benefits. It is a well-known fact that the cost of living has continued to rise, and it is practically impossible for our older citizens to live comfortably and securely solely on the amounts they receive from social security. Over the years with such increased living costs whatever savings they might have been able to accumulate have been utilized for various reasons, and in many cases they find themselves dependent to some degree on relatives or friends, or on the various welfare agencies, for the additional help they need. To remove this restriction on the amount of income which can be earned would certainly make it much easier for them and their families.

At the present time the retirement age for men under the Social Security Act is 65; for women 62. Under the second provision of my bill this would be changed. Men would become eligible for full retirement benefits at the age of 60; and women would be entitled to full benefits at the age of 55. We hear much talk today of early retirement, and our older workers are encouraged to retire as soon as possible to make way for the younger employees. This could be an actual reality and not just a dream if the retirement age were lowered and the benefits liberalized. The lifespan of the individual is growing longer and it is estimated that within 20 years we will have over 20 million Americans over the age of 65. It is the responsibility of the Government to see that an adequate program for the care of these citizens is put into effect.

The final section of the bill deals with the elimination of the requirement that a person must have reached the age of 50 before he can become eligible for disability benefits under the Social Security Act. Many times an employee is injured and disabled through no fault of his own, and under the current provisions must wait many years before he can collect benefits. This proves to be a hardship for him and his family. My bill would permit such an employee to file immediately for benefits to which he is rightfully entitled, thus assisting him in some measure to contribute to the support of his dependents, and preventing his absolute dependency on others.

As Members of Congress we must look to the welfare of all our citizens whether they are young or old, able or disabled. If it is necessary to revise some of our programs to meet the challenge of the changing times then this we must do.

I respectfully urge my colleagues to give every possible consideration to the enactment of my bill.

Private Versus Public Power: A Lesson in Free Enterprise

OF
HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, by a slim margin of two votes, a public power at an estimated cost of $575 million was scuttled 18 months ago in the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. There is little doubt that approval of this legislation in committee would have resulted in final passage in the House of Representatives. I refer, of course, to the controversial high Hells Canyon project.

Now, after a relatively brief lapse of time, we should take inventory of just what has happened, for certainly there is a lesson to be learned by those who are inclined toward Federal spending versus free enterprise.

I personally take pride in the vote that I cast against this proposed half billion dollar-plus project in the face of what has since transpired. The Idaho Power Co. as you know, took on the job as a private enterprise. Now let us look at the situation as it now stands.

The first of three dams has been completed. At Brownlee, just 2 weeks ago, the fourth generating unit in the power-producing facilities of this project was placed "on the line" and is now furnishing 360,000 kilowatts of electric energy to serve the Pacific Northwest. Not only does this constitute a major milestone of progress, but it stands as evidence that costly Government programs which can be handled by private enterprise should be discouraged at every opportunity.

Proponents of this legislation fought to put the Federal Government into the power business at a tremendous expense to the taxpayers of this Nation. Several efforts were made from 1949 until a year and a half ago. When it failed, and while the Idaho Power Co. was proceeding with the job, the taxpayers of my State of Illinois alone were saved exactly $38,023,620, their share of the estimated original cost.

Brownlee Dam is now the second highest rockfill dam in the world and takes its place among the major power-producing installations in the Northwest. Construction is now proceeding vigorously at Oxbow Dam, second unit of the development and preliminary work has already been started on the third unit.

The Idaho Power Co.'s total investment in its three-dam development was approximately $110 million as of the beginning of this year. Power production equipment on special order totals several more millions of dollars. Total cost of the entire project will be about $164 million. In addition to generating tax revenues of $10 million annually for the local, State, and Federal Governments, the development is providing substantial public benefits in the way of flood control, navigation, fish conservation, and recreation.

The first of two upstream migrant-fish facilities is in operation and the second will be completed by March 1. Concrete placement for the Oregon side spillway is nearing completion. The embankment's impervious clay core and downstream rockfill section are under construction. Excavation of two power tunnels starts next month. Nearly 230,000-volt transmission lines to carry the development's electricity into the Northwest power pool are either completed or under construction.

Just as the crocodile tears of public power pressure groups trickled into the waters of the Snake River and disappeared, so have the ill-conceived arguments for the Federal project been washed away by what has been achieved without astronomical Government spending in this instance.

Not only will the full capacity be made available several years sooner than if the Federal Government had done the job, but it will be completed at a cost far less than if Uncle Sam had taken on the responsibility. Public interests will be served better as the private operation flourishes. Instead of spending tax moneys it will bring in revenue. Yes, the high Hells Canyon story is a case in point.

And it brings to mind, too, the words of Abraham Lincoln, who 100 years ago said:

> The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do for themselves in their separate and individual capacities. In all that people can do for themselves, government ought not interfere.

There are many good citizens who apparently have yet to learn that Federal spending for projects that can be accomplished by free enterprise is basically wrong. From this lesson, we learn, too, that the Federal Government invariably spends far more to do the same job than it costs private industry or local government. Will we ever learn that we cannot continue merrily along the road to coddling by the Federal Government in so many areas of our national life? The folks who think that they are getting something for nothing because Uncle Sam takes over the responsibility are either misinformed, too frequently, or they simply will not face the facts of life. In the first place, dollars spent at a Federal level shrink from 25 to 35 percent through administrative costs. And an additional loss occurs through the tremendous interest payments on the national debt.

From all this, we will do well to learn and practice prudence. Perhaps we need some other yardstick by which to measure our spending activities in Washington than the superficial benefit of transferring responsibilities to the Federal Government which do not belong with it. Instead, perhaps we can develop a demand for fiscal responsibility on the part of elected representatives by the electorate in this way.

Yes, it will be a great day for this Nation when political popularity contests are not won by pork barreling, especially when it involves deficit spending.

A Bill To Expand the Veterans' Administration Direct Loan Program

OF
HON. FRED WAMPLER OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, January 27, 1959, I introduced the bill, H.R. 3513, which would expand the veterans' direct loan program by $150 million thereby permitting the Veterans' Administration possibly to make in the neighborhood of an additional 15,000 loans. I understand that this increment in direct loan authority would make it possible for veterans' home loan applications to be processed on a current basis.

My bill is similar to other measures currently before the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs. I feel that finding a solution to the veterans' home loan financing problem, particularly in the rural areas where private money is not readily available, is of signal importance.

Had it not been for the Veterans' Administration's direct loan program, the Nation's veterans, and those veterans in the Sixth District of Indiana, which I have the honor to represent, would have received fewer loans than they have. And, although I find that in the State of Indiana the Veterans' Administration has made approximately 400 direct home loans in a period of less than 9 months, there are, at present, 1,312 Indiana veterans waiting for such a loan; and, unless they get a direct loan, they will be unable to buy a home.

The fact that these 1,000-plus veterans in the State of Indiana have not been able to find private financing has prompted me to introduce the measure, Mr. Speaker, and to urge that it be favorably considered by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. I am genuinely interested in doing everything possible to allow these Indiana veterans, living predominantly in rural areas, small cities and towns, to take advantage of their veterans' benefits, bestowed upon them by law for their service to our Nation.

For example, I am informed that in Warren County, Ind., where there is a veteran population of 790, no guaranteed loans have been made and absolutely no direct loans. I might add that the entire county is eligible for Veterans' Administration direct loan financing.

Surely, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee and the House of Representatives will want to act to ease, if not totally correct, the home-purchase inequity placed upon the veterans of this country's rural areas.

The Highway Trust Fund and Automotive Excise Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR A. KNOX
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to advise my colleagues that I am today introducing legislation providing for the dual purpose of first, strengthening the solvency of the highway trust fund; and, second, reducing to 5 percent the Federal excise taxes applicable to automotive vehicles and parts and accessories. In order that all of you will be familiar with the objectives of my bill I am including in my remarks the following news release I have made on this very important subject:

Congressman VICTOR A. KNOX, Republican, of Michigan, today announced introduction of legislation providing for the dual purpose of (1) strengthening the solvency of the highway trust fund; and (2) reducing to 5 percent the Federal excise taxes applicable to automotive vehicles and parts and accessories. In addition, KNOX's bill would ultimately repeal these excises. The present rate of tax applicable to automotive vehicles is 10 percent and in the case of automotive parts and accessories it is 8 percent.

The bill would provide that the rate reduction to 5 percent would be retroactively effective to sales occurring on or after January 1, 1959. This retroactive date would assure that the benefits of the tax reduction would be available to consumers purchasing automotive vehicles or parts on or after the beginning of the year. Congressman KNOX stated that in addition to immediate tax reduction his proposal would also provide (1) that the funds collected from these reduced tax rates would be entirely earmarked for the highway trust fund beginning with calendar year 1959; and (2) that the reduced rates would be repealed outright on July 1, 1972, at the conclusion of the present Federal-aid highway program.

In summary form the excise tax reductions that would be effective beginning January 1, 1959, and the revenue additions to the highway trust fund from earmarking for fiscal years 1959 and 1960 that would result from the bill are as follows:

1. The present 10 percent tax on passenger automobiles would be reduced to 5 percent. The additional revenue to the highway trust fund from earmarking would be $265 million in fiscal year 1959 and $625 million in fiscal year 1960.

2. The present 10 percent tax on automotive trucks, buses, and trailers would be reduced to 5 percent. This would have no effect on trust fund receipts because one-half of the present 10 percent tax is already earmarked for this purpose.

3. The present 8 percent tax on parts and accessories would be reduced to 5 percent. The increased highway trust fund revenues resulting from the earmarking of the parts and accessories tax would be $50 million in fiscal year 1959 and $100 million in fiscal year 1960.

Total additions to the highway trust fund would be $315 million for fiscal year 1959 and $725 million for fiscal year 1960. Under the Knox proposal the revenues resulting from the earmarking of these tax sources would continue to augment the trust fund receipts for the duration of the present highway program and the taxes would be repealed outright effective July 1, 1972.

Congressman KNOX stated that one of his objectives in sponsoring this legislation was to achieve the meritorious result of immediate reduction in automotive costs imposed on the American people. At the same time he would bolster the economic strength of the automobile industry which is such an important factor in determining the level of overall national prosperity.

Another important objective in the sponsorship of this legislation, according to Congressman KNOX, was his desire to provide a feasible alternative to the budget message proposal to increase highway trust fund revenues by imposing an additional 1½ cents per gallon tax on gasoline. Mr. KNOX stated that by providing an alternative solution to the possible need for added revenues in the highway trust fund he was giving the Congress and the American people opportunity to express a preference for the possible solution desired—either higher motoring taxes; or lower highway taxes better used.

The Michigan legislator stated that while the automobile industry had sustained a promising start toward a more favorable year in 1959, he favored the immediate reduction and ultimate repeal of the automotive excises so as to remove the depressing long-run effect that the onerous Federal excise taxes have had on the industry. He called attention to the fact that nearly 1 million workers look for their employment in industrial plants producing automotive vehicles, parts and tires and that 9 million more individuals look for their employment to other phases of highway transportation. Added reason for a strong automotive industry is found in the fact that one of every seven persons works in the manufacture, distribution, service, or use of motor vehicles.

In demonstrating the benefits that would be realized by industries serving as material suppliers to the automobile industry Mr. KNOX set forth the facts that the manufacturers of motor vehicles and parts buy 23 percent of all steel, 69 percent of all plate glass, 72 percent of all upholstery leather, 41 percent of all lead, 29 percent of all zinc, and 10 percent of all copper sold in the United States.

Congressman KNOX called attention to the fact that another reason supporting his proposed excise tax reduction on automobiles and equipment can be found in other reductions of Korean war excise taxes that have occurred since the termination of that conflict. Mr. KNOX stated that the excises applicable to automotive products are virtually the only rates on any major products that have not been substantially reduced in the intervening period.

Congressman KNOX pointed out that while the enactment of his legislative proposal would tend to reduce highway user taxes presently going into the general funds of the Treasury, the American public is already overburdened with taxes, taxes of every variety. He stated the need for additional highway funds should be met by greater utilization of taxes presently collected from highway use sources and not in higher discriminatory taxes. He also stated that, consistent with his past position in advocating Government economy, he expected to continue his support of Government economy in more than sufficient measure to offset any general fund revenue reduction resulting from his bill.

Help for School Construction

OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article appearing in the January 22, 1959, issue of the Wall Street Journal headlined "Agency Works on New Plan To Spur School Building—Uncle Sam Would Help Local Units Pay Debt Interest, Not Construction Bills."

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately following this news story, my press release of the same date, in which I point out that the administration's school-aid proposal, as leaked to the Wall Street Journal, is designed to help bankers rather than schoolchildren or schoolteachers, and that it shifts the cost to future years so the administration will not have to account for the expenditures during its remaining 2 years.

This administration proposal, I regret to say, bears no relationship to the realities of educational needs.

There being no objection, the article and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AGENCY WORKS ON NEW PLAN TO SPUR SCHOOL BUILDING—UNCLE SAM WOULD HELP LOCAL UNITS PAY DEBT INTEREST, NOT CONSTRUCTION BILLS—FEDERAL SHARE STILL QUESTION

(By James A. Reynolds)

WASHINGTON.—Administration officials are trying to draft a new program to stimulate school construction that would not involve Federal sharing of building costs.

Instead, it would empower Uncle Sam to pay part of a local school district's debt service load—the interest on money the district borrowed to finance construction of new classrooms. Earlier administration aid-to-education proposals included outright Federal grants for school building.

Health, Education, and Welfare Department officials hope the new approach will appeal to White House budget balancers. They figure no Federal outlays would be required until mid-1960, at the earliest. School districts, they argue, would need a few months to float new building bonds, and a year would pass before the first interest on the new bonds would come due.

WOULD NOT AFFECT NEW BUDGET

Thus, the new plan would not unbalance the administration's $77 billion budget for the fiscal year which starts July 1. However, Federal payments might run high in later years.

To get an idea how big the Federal program might grow, consider the size of the present and future school district debt service burden. Federal officials estimate the local districts have obligated themselves to pay $6.5 billion in interest on the outstanding principal borrowed to finance classroom construction. Within the next decade, it's estimated, the districts must add another $6.5 billion to their debt service burden if they hope to keep pace with the demand for new classrooms.

But the Federal agency's planners are not proposing that Uncle Sam take over all of this load. The question of how big a share the United States should accept and for how long is, in fact, the toughest problem facing the bill drafters.

Some officials think Uncle Sam and the school districts should split the future debt service payments 50–50, while others believe the States should assume part of the burden. Only a few States at present help local school districts pay interest on their construction bonds, and in these cases the State share is small.

LENGTH OF PROGRAM

Officials doubt the administration will go so far as to propose that Uncle Sam help carry the debt service load for a bond issue's full term, which frequently runs for 20 to 40 years. It's more likely, they say, that the program would run for only the next 5 or 10 years—the period when they figure most building would have to be done, adding to the chore of carrying the present debt.

The new approach, Health, Education, Welfare officials believe, would stimulate school building in two ways. Districts theoretically would find it easier to borrow money—that is, sell bond issues—if they could show that the State and Federal Governments would be responsible for meeting part of the interest payments.

Moreover, they figure many districts that are already heavily in debt might be encouraged to take on still more in an effort to overcome classroom shortages if some of the worry over the cost of future borrowings were shared by the Federal and State Governments.

Currently, officials are studying the new scheme only for elementary and secondary school construction. But if it's tried and works, they add, it might later be used to stimulate construction of college classrooms. The Federal Government already offers low-rate loans for the construction of college housing, but is not seeking any new funds for this program for fiscal 1960.

NEW APPROACH FOR ADMINISTRATION

If it were adopted, the new approach would mark a major change in administration thinking on school construction. Twice before, President Eisenhower has asked Congress for up to $2 billion of Federal aid to States over a 4-year period to spur building of new classrooms. Both times the program failed to pass when it got snarled in a congressional fight over civil rights. Last year, the administration dropped its school construction efforts, and instead concentrated on winning legislation to step up science and engineering education.

This year, many Democrats are expected to line up behind an aid-to-education measure sponsored by two Montana Democrats, Senator MURRAY and Representative METCALF. They propose Federal grants to States, based on each State's school-age population, for school buildings or teachers' salaries. If the Federal payment was fixed at $25 per child, the program might cost $1.1 billion a year.

The National Education Association currently favors the Murray-Metcalf approach, but N.E.A. officials decline to say how they'd view the Health, Education officials' plan.

Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, chairman of the Senate Education Subcommittee today made the following statement:

"The administration's school aid proposal, which was leaked to the Wall Street Journal today is designed to help bankers rather than schoolchildren or schoolteachers. It shifts the cost to future years so the administration won't have to account for the expenditures during its remaining 2 years.

"The administration proposal bears no relationship to the realities of educational needs.

"The administration would have the Federal Government pay part of a local school district's debt service load. According to the Journal:

" 'Health, Education, and Welfare Department officials hope the new approach will appeal to White House budget balancers. They figure no Federal outlays would be required until mid-1960, at the earliest. Thus the new plan would not unbalance the administration's $77 billion budget for the fiscal year which starts July 1. However, Federal payments might run high in later years.'

"In other words, the Eisenhower administration does not care if the Federal budget is unbalanced, provided it will be the budget of the succeeding Democratic administration. Furthermore, the bankers who have done so well under Eisenhower want this program so the succeeding Democratic administration will have to continue paying them high Republican interest rates. I imagine administration officials and their big business friends stayed late at the club several evenings cooking up this bit of mockery.

"It is also evident that the advice of people who know educational needs was disregarded. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare has stated his view that teacher salaries should be doubled. To do this would require approximately $6 billion annually. According to the U.S. Office of Education it would require about $5.4 billion to construct the more than 135,000 classrooms needed just to meet present needs.

"S. 2 which 30 Senators joined me in introducing, would permit a start on meeting this great need, by authorizing grants to the States to be used for classroom construction or teacher salaries or a combination of these two purposes, as each State sees fit.

"I would suggest to the administration that in preparation for forthcoming hearings by the Education Subcommittee it begin to consider the needs of education rather than the desires of bankers, and the relative financial condition of States and local school districts as compared with the Federal Government. From 1948 to 1957 our national debt increased from $252 billion to $270 billion, but our national income increased from $223.5 billion to $364 billion. We as a nation are like the man who 10 years ago bought a house with a $6,000 mortgage when he made $5,000 a year. He recently bought a bigger house which had a $7,000 mortgage; however, his salary is now more than $8,000 a year. He obviously is now in a much better position to pay for his new house.

"And he certainly is in a better position than the man who, like many local school districts, is in debt so far, according to his ability to pay, that the banker waves him out the door."

Pay TV

OF
HON. CHARLES A. VANIK
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, good television is one of the rare and occasional free gifts of our free enterprise system.

Last evening on the Columbia Network "Show of the Month" the television production "What Every Woman Knows," sponsored by Du Pont and starring Siobhan McKenna, was a superb 90-minute show with temperate advertising inserts. This was followed by a splendid bit of TV journalism in a production entitled "Castro's Revolution."

Shows of this type would dispel any interest in pay TV.

Can the Republican Elephant Be Whitewashed?

OF
HON. KEN HECHLER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, in the heart of the farm belt at Des Moines, Iowa, last week some very plain words were spoken by leading Republicans. The chairman of the Republican National Committee, Mr. Meade Alcorn, and other high officials in the Republican Party called for more leadership from the White House and also a statement of principles to define what the Republican Party stands for.

The Republican leaders cheered loudly when these suggestions were made.

At the Des Moines meeting, it was reported that Claude Robinson of the Opinion Research Corp. of Princeton, N.J., stated that surveys showed that the Republican Party is suffering from political anemia and can only be cured by strong medicine, that the Republican Party has come to be regarded as the party of the rich and privileged—the uppercrust—whereas the Democratic Party is regarded as the party of the common man, the masses.

It was further reported that Mr. Meade Alcorn agreed with Robinson's statements, and Mr. Alcorn added:

> We must immediately undertake to change the false image of the Republican Party as the party of big business, the party of the vested interest, and so on. It's time we snatched off the big business false face that the Democrats placed on us years ago. It's time we erased the dollar signs painted on our vests.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party can try and try to put a coat of whitewash over its elephant, but the elephant will still look as though it were made of gold.

Many years ago P. T. Barnum advertised far and wide that he had imported a white elephant which he would present at the circus. Mr. Barnum got scores of newspapermen together and plied them with lots of liquor before he brought them out to view his white elephant. One of the journalists who never took a drink caught up with Mr. Barnum, however, and exposed the hoax when he scratched off some of the white paint with his fingernails. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the same thing will happen if the Republican Party tries to whitewash its elephant.

Mr. Speaker, it took great courage for Mr. Alcorn and the leaders of the Republican Party at Des Moines to speak out so forcefully, and to demand that the White House provide the country with some leadership. That is exactly what we Democrats have been saying for 6 years, but it takes courage for a Republican to speak up and confirm what we have been saying. Yesterday, one of our newspaper columnists wrote that there were rumors of a great revolutionary movement going on: Now that Sherman Adams has left the White House, it is even rumored that President Eisenhower will seize power.

On November 4, 1958, an election was held. The voice of the people spoke. And it spoke in favor of action rather than drift, leadership instead of the Alphonse-and-Gaston approach, and an end to the part-time attention to full-time problems.

We Democrats in the 86th Congress intend to provide the leadership which the people of our country demand to carry out a program in the interest of all the people. And then in 1960 we will restore to our great country and the free world the leadership on the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue which we have not seen since Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman.

The Administration's Labor-Management Proposals

OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker I wish to say a few words in support of the administration's labor-managment proposals. I am particularly happy to see that provision is made in these proposals for the regulation of union trusteeships. In this respect, I think this bill is an improvement over the administration's legislative recommendations in this area last year.

The extensive hearings of the McClellan committee have shown that one of the principal means by which a few unscrupulous labor leaders have grasped and retained unfettered control over local unions is through imposing trusteeships. There are, of course, times when it is necessary for a national or international union to assume such powers, but there is never any excuse for continuing a trusteeship beyond the time necessary to put the local's affairs in order. The administration's bill makes adequate provision for imposing such control under proper circumstances, but it also provides machinery by which it may be terminated if improperly imposed or continued beyond the time actually needed.

I believe the provisions the President asks will go a long way toward eliminating and preventing abuses of power and corruption not only on the part of labor leaders but also by unscrupulous employers. I heartily endorse this bill and hope it will soon be enacted.

Voluntary Retirement Savings Plans for Self-Employed Individuals

OF
HON. WILLIAM C. CRAMER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I have today again introduced legislation to encourage the establishment of voluntary retirement savings plans for self-employed individuals. This legislation, which is similar to the measure which I introduced last session and identical with the bill that was passed by the House of Representatives on July 29, 1958, would permit self-employed individuals to take a current deduction for a limited amount of income invested in certain types of retirement annuity or trust. The investments would be treated as ordinary income when actually received in later years. This legislation is intended to achieve a greater equality of tax treatment between self-employed persons and employees.

Under present law, a corporation can deduct from taxes money put into a qualified employee pension plan and the employee is not taxed on this money until he actually receives the retirement income in later years.

When this provision was made in our tax law in 1942, the millions of self-employed persons were apparently overlooked. These self-employed citizens are denied this opportunity to defer taxes on retirement savings.

This legislation would generally apply to persons who are subject to the tax on self-employment income—for social-security purposes. This would include doctors, barbers, druggists, farmers, undertakers, lawyers, accountants, and other self-employed persons.

The bill would permit self-employed persons to take a deduction for a limited amount of income which they voluntarily place into a restricted retirement plan. This deduction is in general limited to 10 percent of net income from self-employment, but not to exceed $2,500 in any one taxable year and it may not exceed $50,000, during the lifetime of the self-employed person.

If an individual is over 50 years of age on the effective date of the proposed act, the limitation on the annual deduction is increased by one-tenth for each year that his age exceeds 50. For example, if he is age 60, the annual limit on his deduction would be 20 percent of income, but not over $5,000. No deduction is allowed for any year beginning after the taxpayer attains age 70.

That the present tax law discriminates against the self-employed is not denied.

Can this discrimination be morally perpetuated indefinitely when a just and economical revision of the law is available?

If tax deferment is economically sound for the employed, then why is it not equally sound and just for the self-employed?

Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House gave their answer to these questions on July 29, 1958, by overwhelmingly passing legislation similar to that which I introduce. I sincerely hope that this Congress will pass such legislation early in this session.

Extension of Public Law 480

OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

PROGRAM AUTHORITIES

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the President is recommending an extension of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, commonly described as Public Law 480, an authority we have used during the past 4½ years to make effective use of our agricultural abundance at home and abroad. All of us can take pride in the results achieved under this authority.

The four programs operating under Public Law 480 have moved, or will move shortly, agricultural commodities valued at about $7½ billion. Some of these programs supply commodities at the cost that the Commodity Credit Corporation has invested in them. Even so, the value of these commodities at world market prices exceeds $5½ billion.

The largest and most important program under Public Law 480 is the title I authority to sell commodities to friendly countries for foreign currencies. These sales are opening up markets in many countries, particularly those that are less developed, where the demand for American farm products is high, but where the dollars to make such purchases are extremely scarce.

Two donation programs are authorized. One permits the President to send CCC surpluses abroad to meet the needs of countries suffering from natural disasters such as drought or flood or other emergencies; the other donation program provides for the distribution of commodities from CCC stocks to needy persons in many countries of the world through United States voluntary relief agencies. And, of course, Public Law 480 is the law under which food is furnished to needy persons in the United States.

The fourth authority is the barter program by which we exchange CCC surpluses for strategic and other materials which may be stockpiled or used by U.S. Government agencies.

TITLE I FOREIGN CURRENCY SALES

More than 60 percent of total programing under Public Law 480 has come under title I, a unique approach to the use of U.S. farm production. This device has proved useful far beyond our original expectations. It has been largely responsible for expanding U.S. agricultural exports in recent years, thereby keeping large quantities of commodities from going into Government warehouses. It has increased farm income. And through the use of the foreign currency sales proceeds, it is contributing to the economic development of our friends and allies abroad.

Title I agreements already concluded provide for the sale of 800 million bushels of wheat, of which 600 million bushels have already been exported; 200 million bushels of feed grains, of which about 180 million bushels have been shipped; 3 billion pounds of fats and oils, such as soybean oil, of which 2.5 billion pounds have been shipped; 3.5 million bales of cotton, of which 3 million bales have been shipped; 29 million bags of rice, virtually all already shipped; 225 million pounds of tobacco, of which 190 million pounds have already been exported; 235 million pounds of dairy products, of which 185 million pounds have been shipped; and other commodities.

Program operations under the current authorization are moving along very well with signed agreements having committed about $800 million of the $2¼ billion authorization. These agreements were concluded since last September when the new authorization was made available to the Department of Agriculture. I understand from the Department that additional programs are being developed which will bring the total commitments to more than $1 billion very shortly.

These new agreements, plus unshipped quantities from previous authorizations, have enabled the Department to increase exports under the program during the first 6 months of this fiscal year substantially as compared with the same period of fiscal year 1958. During the first 6 months of this year, for example, title I has resulted in the exportation of about 100 million bushels of wheat, 40 million bushels of feed grains, 365 million pounds of soybean oil, and 45 million pounds of dairy products.

OTHER BENEFITS OF TITLE I

The commodity importance of title I is obvious. There are other important collateral benefits of the program. A substantial portion of the sales proceeds is loaned back to participating countries for projects which will develop the economies of these countries: electric powerplants, roads, distribution facilities, railroads, and similar basic improvements which are being made to raise standards of living, increase jobs, and in general accelerate economic development plans already started by many of the less fortunate countries in the world.

Under agreements concluded during the past 18 months up to 25 percent of the sales proceeds are loaned to private business firms, mostly U.S. firms, for business development or to establish facilities to increase the consumption of U.S. agricultural commodities. Loans to U.S. businessmen have been made, for example, in Mexico, Israel, and France; and loan applications are now being reviewed for the use of currencies in many other countries.

The title I program also helps attain U.S. foreign policy and mutual security objectives. In certain countries currencies are made available for military assistance purposes and grants are being made to improve and expand health and education programs.

Not the least important is the use of currencies to develop markets for U.S. farm products. Millions of dollars in foreign currencies are being used in various ways to maintain and expand our markets throughout the world.

I know that the President can count on the support of the Congress for the extension and enlargement of Public Law 480.

Let's Save Our Historic Treasures

OF
HON. JIM WRIGHT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have this week introduced in the House a bill designed to save from destruction many historic buildings, landmarks, and works of art owned by the Government throughout the country. Such treasures continue to be threatened intermittently with demolition.

It is my privilege to sponsor this legislation jointly with my colleagues and friends, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS], the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MERROW], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT]. The bipartisan nature of this endeavor is particularly gratifying to me.

The bill has been referred for action to the House Committee on Public Works, on which I am privileged to serve, and I am confident of a sympathetic hearing in that committee. Similar legislation is being introduced in the other body by Senator CLARK.

The need for such legislation, Mr. Speaker, was first made evident by the protests of the Federal Commission on Fine Arts, the American Institute of Architects, and the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

Studies by these groups and by others have made it obvious that literally thousands of the most priceless treasures of our national heritage have been plowed under and utterly destroyed by the bulldozers of a ruthless progress during the past few years. The tragedy is that in most such instances, the destruction was wholly unnecessary. The valuable historic objects could have been preserved without retarding progress.

We obviously should not permit this thoughtless and wanton destruction of these last relics of our past, because they provide, in many cases, the only visible links to connect us with periods of our own national history. They remind us of the greatness of our past, of the hardships endured by those who with such painstaking care laid the foundations of our history.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to cite just a few illustrations as examples of the thoughtless destruction of priceless edifices by various governmental agencies.

A number of historic buildings dating back to the Revolutionary period, including the ancestral homes of the Lee family of Virginia, are right now in danger of being obliterated to make way for the new Chantilly Airport. These homes should be preserved and if necessary relocated.

The old San Francisco Mint, one of the few buildings to survive the famous earthquake and fire of 1906, a classic building of great historic and architectural value, has been declared surplus by the General Services Administration. The site is wanted for a parking lot.

A historic Dutch mansion, built around 1790, was acquired by the Government along with the surrounding land on the Hudson River for a Veterans' Administration hospital. This building certainly could have been preserved on the site as a museum and used as a waiting cottage for visitors. Instead, it was sold to a wrecker for $32. The wrecker dismantled it, sold the facade for $3,200 and disposed of the remainder in piecemeal sales.

A number of extremely ancient Indian pueblos, probably dating to a prehistoric period, have been destroyed in the path of bulldozers on highway work throughout the Southwest, notably in New Mexico. One is reminded of the supposed American visitor to Pompeii. The dynamic fellow's only remark, upon viewing the ruins, was "just think how fast a few bulldozers and razing cranes could level this outfit and let them start all over."

Only a very few of the remaining log cabins in Texas have been preserved, and the rate at which they are going out of the picture may leave us without adequate links to our western frontier.

I certainly do not want to stay the hand of progress, Mr. Speaker, nor retard the necessary developments of our advancing civilization, but I do feel that progress can and should move forward with an eye to saving the truly valuable and inspirational remains of our proud past.

This bill would direct the Administrator of the GSA, the real estate arm of the Government, and the Secretary of the Interior to preserve such objects when they come into the Government's possession. I respectfully petition the support of my House colleagues in this worthy effort.

The President's Farm Message

OF

HON. CHARLES M. TEAGUE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to give the strongest possible endorsement to the recommendations in this special message on agriculture. This is the fourth special message which the President has sent to the Congress during his tenure in office. It is a sound message. It is a constructive message.

These are critical times. The men in the Kremlin talk about their desire for a thaw in the cold war. But there is no evidence that the temperature of that conflict is rising by so much as one single degree.

We must keep our economy sound, strong, and vigorous. We must live within our income as a Nation. The recommendations of the President's farm message are a long step in that direction.

Mr. Speaker, I have long been concerned about the high cost of our farm programs. When the President tells us that the outlay for these stabilization programs this current fiscal year will be $5.4 billion, I am deeply concerned. And I think the American people should be, and are, also deeply concerned.

The net income of our farm operators last year was about $13 billion. In other words, these prices and income stabilization programs are currently equal to more than 40 percent of the net income earned by our farm operators. This is an alarming situation—a dangerous situation. It is a situation that the American people will find hard to understand.

If these costs were only temporary—if they were solving the problem—if they were leading to a better balance between supplies and markets—taxpayers would feel that such heavy costs were justified.

But we all know this is not the case. Under the old farm programs these costs are not only continuing year after year; they are continually rising.

Instead of solving the problem the programs under which these vast sums are being spent are creating additional problems. They are causing distortions throughout the agricultural economy. They are making agriculture more and more dependent on Government. More and more of our farm products are finding their way into Government warehouses—and a Government warehouse is not a market.

Instead of cutting down the surplus, the programs responsible for these heavy costs are leading to increased accumulations. The wheat surplus is now far larger than ever before and it is expected to go on increasing at least until the end of the 1960 fiscal year. The feed grain surplus is also at an all-time high.

By next July the Government will have an investment of over $9 billion in price supported farm commodities.

By the time the Government completes its takeover from last year's crops, it will have acquired—since January 1953—25 million bales of cotton and 2½ billion bushels of wheat.

This is a fantastic situation. Do the Members realize that 25 million bales of cotton is more than twice as much as our whole cotton crop last year? Do the Members realize that 2½ billion bushels of wheat is more than our 1957 and 1958 crops combined?

But even these figures do not tell the whole story.

Mr. Speaker, when the 1958 crops have come into Government ownership the cost for storage, interest, and other charges of managing the inventory of supported crops will exceed a billion dollars a year. Think of it. More than a billion dollars a year, not for price support loans to farmers, but simply for keeping these inventories. And we are told that unless fundamental changes are made, this annual cost of over a billion a year will rise.

We must move promptly toward sounder, more realistic, farm programs—toward farm programs that make sense. The President has wisely warned us against jumping from the frying pan into the fire by attempting programs that would be even more costly and dangerous.

We must not fall into the trap of direct payments. These would make our farm people dependent for much of their income on the Federal Treasury. Direct payments could cost from $7 billion to $10 billion a year.

Multiple price programs are also unsound. They would tax American consumers to permit the sale of farm commodities for feed and export at lower prices.

Let us be sound. Let us be realistic. We owe it to farmers and consumers alike. Let us adopt the President's recommendations.

The President's Message on the Agricultural Program

OF

HON. JOHN H. RAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I have examined carefully the President's message on the agricultural program and the supporting memorandum of Secretary Benson, both of which were submitted to Congress today. The message and the memorandum reflect careful and thorough study by able and well-informed specialists. In my judgment the recommendations so presented are wise and constructive and I hope they will all be enacted into law promptly.

Wheat—And the Farm Message

OF
HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, wheat is in serious trouble. Surpluses of the bread grain have built up so fast and so high that they now represent the biggest single problem we face in agriculture. And present trends show that the situation would get worse if we continued along the way we have been going.

We are nearly smothered under excess wheat now. The surplus pile will reach really impossible levels in the near future if we fail to take necessary action. Let's take a quick look at the facts—the highlights of the wheat situation.

We made a little progress in whittling down the wheat surplus between 1956 and 1958. Through aggressive and expensive efforts, we managed to cut production temporarily through programs like the soil bank—and to expand exports through special programs under Public Law 480.

Last summer, however, the dam broke. Excellent weather, combined with price support incentives, brought both yields and total production to alltime records. The gains of 2 or 3 years were more than wiped out. Surpluses shot up to new peaks in a hurry.

Total wheat production in 1958 was about 1,450 million bushels. Added to a carryover of 880 million bushels of old wheat on hand last July 1, this gave us a total supply for this marketing year of more than 2,300 million bushels—a record, 14 percent above the previous high.

To see what this means in terms of surplus, let us check our outlets for wheat—the total annual disappearance. Domestic use has been running around 600 million bushels; exports, with the aid of special subsidy programs, around 400 million—or total annual disappearance at about the billion-bushel mark.

And so—unbelievable as it may be—we had enough wheat on hand after last summer's harvest to meet all our domestic and export needs for 2 full years, and more. Put another way, if we did not grow a bushel of wheat this year—1959—we would still have enough to fill all available outlets until the 1960 crop came in. And, in fact, we would have a 300 million bushel carryover to start off that 1960–61 marketing year.

In carrying out mandatory price-support programs, the Government has had to invest tremendous sums in wheat. One and one-quarter billion bushels are being held in inventory or under price-support loan. The investment in this hoard of wheat is $3 billion—well over a third of the total price-support investment.

When the Commodity Credit Corporation takes over 1958-crop loan wheat later this spring, it will be paying $700,000 a day for wheat storage alone.

I said the wheat surplus figures might be almost unbelievable. They are, but unfortunately they represent hard, realistic facts. Action to reverse this blind trend toward catastrophe is past due.

In his farm message, the President has faced up to the wheat crisis. He has done so clearly and constructively, recognizing the basic problems and giving us clear guidelines for alternate courses of action.

Rigid, too-high support prices have obviously been responsible for much of our current trouble. The President wisely calls for adjustments to correct this weakness. One course would be to relate price supports to the average market of recent years. The other would be to provide the same discretion in setting price levels, as a percentage of parity, which now holds for all crops except the half dozen so-called basics. Either course would be a long step toward a sound basis for the wheat program.

Production and marketing controls represent the other major part of the basic wheat program problems. Those we have been trying to use have not worked. The President outlines two possible changes. One would relax controls, giving wheat farmers the freedom to produce and compete for markets, and using the conservation reserve of the soil bank to help cushion the transition. The other would tighten controls and eliminate present loopholes in the operation of the program—at least during an emergency adjustment period.

As the President points out clearly, the tighter control route would mean a degree of regimentation more drastic than Congress has been willing to impose in the past. It would mean lower acreage for wheat producers, more positive production controls, and heavier marketing penalties.

Virtually everyone agrees that we must do something about wheat now. The President has courageously recognized the inevitable. He has outlined alternate choices of action, with the final decisions properly left to the Congress. The action we take can reverse adverse trends and lay the foundation for continuing sound growth of our great wheat industry, or it can permit the already crucial situation to build toward the impossible.

Anniversary of Birth of Albert Gallatin

OF
HON. THADDEUS M. MACHROWICZ
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 198th anniversary of a great American of Swiss birth, Albert Gallatin.

Albert Gallatin, brilliant U.S. Secretary of the Treasury under Jefferson, was born on January 29, 1761. He was descended from a family of watchmakers, and born in Geneva, ancient capital of the modern watch industry which today contributes so importantly to United States-Swiss trade. Sensing that a greater future would be found in the new Nation struggling for its independence, he landed in America in 1780 and threw in his lot with the American patriots. After the Revolution he entered a political career in which he was successfully Pennsylvania State Legislator, Congressman, Senator, Secretary of the Treasury, and Ambassador to Great Britain and France.

I wish particularly to remind my colleagues that Albert Gallatin, while a Member of the U.S House of Representatives was the founder of the great Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am proud to be a member.

His life was devoted to many enterprises, most important of which were the system of free universal education, reform of Federal tax and budgetary policies, and the promotion of sound commercial relations with foreign nations throughout the world. He said:

> It is commerce which unites the nations of the civilized world. It is principally to commerce that we are indebted for modern civilization.

We all recognize that America's ties with the entire free world are now challenged by the powerful, divisive force of Soviet collectivism. To cope with this challenge we must revive Gallatin's principles on trade as a guide to our future action. We must renew and strengthen our commercial ties to what Gallatin called the nations of the civilized world. We can accomplish this vital task, only if Members of the House can approach their job in the spirit of the founder of the House Ways and Means Committee—the great Albert Gallatin.

An Amendment Clarifying the Intent of the Outdoor Advertising Control Section of the Federal-Aid Highway Act

OF
HON. JAMES J. DELANEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today an amendment to the Federal-Aid Highway Act to clarify the intent of Congress regarding the regulation of outdoor advertising along the Interstate System. My amendment proposes to make it clear beyond any doubt that Congress intended to regulate—not prohibit—advertising along this great new network of roads.

Furthermore, my amendment insures that any such regulation must be fair and reasonable, and must not be prohibition in disguise.

What has made the introduction and the adoption of this amendment absolutely essential is the fact that the regulations, as they exist today, do constitute prohibition.

This unfortunate situation—posing a substantial threat to a large portion of our economy—was created by the Department of Commerce when it wrote the regulations. That agency completely misinterpreted the intent of Congress. Instead of regulation, the Commerce Department interpreted the act passed by the 85th Congress last year to mean prohibition and wrote a set of rules accordingly.

These rules are known as national standards for the display of outdoor advertising. Unless the proposed amendment is adopted, there is nothing to prevent the national standards issued last November 10 by former Secretary of Commerce Weeks from continuing in full force and effect.

Such an eventuality would work a great injustice upon the outdoor advertising business, which is a thoroughly legitimate and necessary business that helps promote our economy. We should not permit an administrative agency to flout the intent of Congress and injure such a business. It is therefore essential that prompt action be taken by this House to right the wrong that has been done.

For the benefit of the Members who are not familiar with this legislation, I will briefly review it. It has been customary every 2 years for Congress to pass a Federal-Aid Highway Act, the most important provisions of which authorize appropriations for road construction for the ensuing 2 years. The latest of such acts became the law on April 16, 1958—Public Law 85-381—and is known as the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958. It included a section 122 entitled "Areas Adjacent to the Interstate System." Section 122 has been incorporated into the codification of the Federal Aid Highway Acts, title 23 of the Code, and is now known as section 131. I will refer to it as section 131.

This section declares it to be a national policy that the erection and maintenance of outdoor advertising signs within 660 feet of the edge of the right-of-way of the Interstate System should be regulated. It further provides that the regulation must be consistent with national standards to be prepared and promulgated by the Secretary of Commerce. These standards are to include only four types of signs. After the adoption of the standards, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to enter into agreements with the State highway departments to carry out the national policy. Any State that enters into such an agreement is entitled under this section to have its share of the Federal aid, payable on account of any project on the Interstate System, to be increased by one-half of 1 percent of the total cost of the project. That, in brief, summarizes the pertinent provisions of section 131.

Section 131 uses the word "regulate." It does not use the word "prohibit." In fact, one of the earlier bills upon which section 131 was based did use the word "prohibit." This word was stricken from the compromise measure which formed the basis of section 131 as finally adopted.

Indeed, the sponsors of this legislation declared frequently during Senate debate last year that the purpose of the act was to regulate and not prohibit outdoor advertising.

For example, on last March 25, and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Senator GORE said:

> The bill does not provide for prohibition, either by States or by the Federal Government.

Senator NEUBERGER said on March 24 that—and I quote again from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> If State law authorizes the kinds of signs mentioned in the third and fourth classes of subsection (a), the standards promulgated by the Secretary may only contain reasonable regulation of them, not total prohibition.

Mr. Speaker, what could be clearer as to legislative intent? But did the Secretary of Commerce need this mandate? No; he went several steps beyond.

Allow me to cite some specific examples from the national standards. Take section 20.10 titled "State Regulations." This section reads:

> A State may elect to prohibit signs permissible under the standards in this part without forfeiting its rights to any benefits provided for in the act.

I ask you, is this a standard of regulation? No. It is nothing more than a gratuitous invitation on the part of the Secretary of Commerce for the States to prohibit advertising completely. Quite plainly this section tells the States that they may prohibit a legitimate business and still get their bonus. They will be paid for complete prohibition.

Only the most technical of interpretations of the wording of the act could justify the Secretary in making a payment for prohibition, or for that matter, to even invite prohibition.

Let us look at it this way. If Congress had intended to make the bonus payable for straight prohibition, then why did Congress not say so right in the law? Since this was not the intent of Congress, why then should it be allowed to stand as part of the national standards?

There are other—more direct—provisions in the national standards leading to prohibition. Section 20.6 of the standards authorizes what it calls informational sites. Where one of these sites was constructed, all commercial signs would be prohibited for 12 miles in either direction.

This, too, is a gratuitous addition to the law. If you read section 131 of the Highway Code you will find no mention whatsoever of informational sites. Furthermore, at the time the act was being debated in Congress last year there was no mention or suggestion that informational sites should be established along interstate highways.

As a matter of fact, the first reference in Congress concerning these sites did not come until May 13 of last year, nearly a month after the law was enacted. On that day Senator NEUBERGER put forth the idea. The Commerce Department promptly grabbed it as an easy way to make it appear as though outdoor advertising were being permitted, when in actual practice informational sites would prohibit it.

The Commerce Department envisions these sites as being pulloffs from the highway where a number of small commercial signs are displayed on big boards, like a directory. Motorists would even have to get out of their cars to read them.

Now the purpose of outdoor advertising is to convey a message to persons as they move about from one place to another—walking, driving a car, riding a train, et cetera. This is the historical, commonly understood, and generally accepted concept of the meaning and purpose of outdoor advertising.

If one took a classified telephone directory and hung it on a post out of doors, we would not have outdoor advertising. By the same token, informational sites are not outdoor advertising. Because they would no more fulfill the true function of outdoor advertising than a telephone directory hanging from a post along the highway.

I might point out that there is no such thing as an informational site in existence in this country today.

Certainly, if there were any utilitarian advantage to such a device, some State would have constructed one by now.

Another provision of the national standards which leads to the virtual prohibition of outdoor advertising is the one contained in subparagraph (b) of section 20.7. This prohibits signs within 2 miles in advance of an interchange. The latest figure that I have been able to obtain from the Bureau of Roads indicates that interchanges on the Interstate System will be on the average about 3½ miles apart. While it can be said with accuracy, that this regulation does not absolutely prohibit all signs, it also can be said with equal accuracy that it prohibits so many signs that it will act as a practical prohibition.

Furthermore, there is practical prohibition in the size limitation set by the Secretary on the few signs which are permissible. He has decreed that the maximum size shall be 150 square feet, which would allow for a 10- by 15-foot sign.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this restriction would exclude one whole segment of the outdoor advertising business, the segment known as the standardized outdoor advertising industry.

This advertising medium, as it is called, many years ago standardized its signs at 300 square feet, a fact, I daresay, that is well known by the Secretary. Yet, he wrote the standards so that standardized outdoor advertising would be prohibited.

I ask you, Is this reasonable regulation to make a raw discrimination against an established industry which has earned its niche in the economy? No. It is prohibition by regulation, just as the other facts and figures show that I have presented.

Prohibition of alcohol was tried once in this country. It was a failure. Prohibition is not the way of a democracy. It is an exercise of tyranny. Let us live up to the spirit of democracy and not be tyrants. Once the door is open to prohibition of legitimate business for purely esthetic reasons, where will it be stopped? Perhaps other groups will criticize and then try to abolish other types of structures for esthetic reasons. Certainly there is room for great differences of opinion. What is a pleasing attractive structure to one, may be completely unattractive and unpleasing to others. Are we to turn over to an administrative agency the power to prohibit a legitimate business on such unstable grounds? Shall we permit a precedent that may leave the door wide open for the prohibition of other legitimate businesses in the future according to the whims of an articulate minority?

In conclusion, section 131 authorizes the appropriation of several hundreds of millions of dollars to be paid to the States for the regulation of outdoor advertising. The Secretary of Commerce, through his promulgation of the national standards, has authorized the pouring out of these millions for a very different purpose, that is, as a bonus to those States which completely prohibit outdoor advertising or which adopt the national standards which require a virtual prohibition of outdoor advertising. In my opinion, no bill that called for paying these millions for a complete prohibition could have passed Congress. The national standards go far beyond the intent of Congress. The only way to carry out the intent of Congress is to pass the proposed bill, which will make it clear beyond all shadow of doubt that it is a regulatory, not a prohibitory, bill, and which will require new national standards that are not confiscatory, but fair and reasonable, and permit the continuation of a legitimate business which benefits this economy.

Legislation Clarifying and Overcoming Certain Supreme Court Decisions Is Essential

OF

HON. WILLIAM C. CRAMER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the fourth in a series of bills to clarify or overcome Supreme Court decisions in some of the more aggravating cases, specifically including bills dealing with the Mallory, Sullivan, Yates, and Nelson cases.

I have previously introduced H.R. 491 dealing with the redefinition of the term "organize" which was necessitated by the Yates decision which ruled, in effect, that it is legal to organize Communist cells with the avowed purpose of teaching and preaching the overthrow of the Government of the United States. This bill passed the House unanimously on final passage but failed in the Senate during the last session.

I also introduced H.R. 488 dealing with the Mallory case which had the effect of permitting a confessed Negro rapist to go free in Washington, D.C., by ruling his confession as inadmissible solely because the accused was held for 7½ hours between his arrest and arraignment—with no elements of coercion whatsoever present. My bill would make such admissions admissible in evidence.

In addition, I introduced H.R. 492 dealing with the Nelson case which invalidated the Pennsylvania State antisedition statute simply because the Federal Smith Act, the antisedition statute, was enacted on a national basis, and despite the fact that nowhere did it state that it was the intention of Congress that the Federal act should supersede or preempt the State statute on the same subject matter. My bill would prevent such implied preemption by the Supreme Court in the future and is similar to H.R. 3 introduced by Mr. SMITH of Virginia.

Today, I introduced the fourth bill, dealing with the Sullivan case in which the Court ruled that gamblers could deduct from their income tax expenses incurred in carrying out their illegal operations, which, together with the Mallory case, gives the criminal licenses to commit crimes by stymying law enforcement efforts. My bill would eliminate this deduction.

It is my fervent hope that this Congress will more readily accept its responsibility in these fields of fighting communism and strengthening our criminal law enforcement than did the 85th Congress which failed to enact any of the first three bills, the fourth resulting from a subsequent ruling of the Court. As the ranking minority Member in the 86th Congress of the Special Subcommittee on Supreme Court Decisions, of the Judiciary Committee, a subcommittee that did much fine and constructive work in this field, it is my hope that our efforts will bear fruit this session.

National Science Academy

OF

HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, on December 31, 1958, the Washington Post and Times Herald published on its front page a story bearing this headline: "Ike Warned on Lack of Trained Men." The story began thus:

> President Eisenhower was told yesterday the United States is in danger of running low on trained manpower while the Soviet Union is driving for technical supremacy. The President's Committee on Scientists and Engineers said it is convinced the Nation faces a "grave problem in highly trained manpower during the coming decade."
> It expressed doubt that "present public agitation reflected a real understanding of our long-term need for scientists, engineers, and technicians."

Thus, nearly 16 months after Soviet Russia launched its sputnik and despite our own scientific achievements of the past year, we are still being warned by the President's Committee on Scientists and Engineers that we are facing a "grave problem in highly trained manpower" and that the American public still lacks "a real understanding of our long-term need" for scientists.

A year ago this month, on the opening day of the 1958 session of Congress, I introduced a bill for the establishment of a U.S. science academy. Its purpose was to help remedy the very shortage of trained scientists, engineers, and technicians about which we now hear and will continue to hear in the future, unless we take the necessary action now. What was true a year ago is even more true today, except that we have lost a whole year of time. This matter is therefore not only timely, but most urgent. I fear the problem may grow greater and graver by the month.

I have now revised my bill and brought it up-to-date. Today, I am reintroducing it and I am happy to report that our colleague from New York, the Honorable KATHARINE ST. GEORGE, has informed me that she will be pleased to be a cosponsor of the measure.

The bill provides for the establishment of a National Science Academy under the jurisdiction of the National Science Foundation, rather than under the Defense Department. The Academy is visualized as an educational institution emphasizing scientific knowledge and research, rather than as a military academy along the lines of West Point or Annapolis.

The purpose of the National Science Academy, as defined in the bill, shall be "to train selected men and women, to be known as science trainees, in the field of science or engineering for service as officers or employees of the United States." Specifically, this institution is to prepare young men and young women for scientific careers devoted primarily to the security of our Nation.

Highlights of the bill may be stated as follows:

Young men and young women, between the ages of 17 and 25, may be nominated as candidates for appointment to the National Science Academy by the President or by Members of Congress. Final admission to the Academy will be determined on the basis of qualifying examinations as prescribed and supervised by the National Science Foundation. Those who are admitted will receive a 4-year course of study, at Government expense, in which they will be trained in science, engineering, mathematics, and related fields.

Upon completion of the course of studies, the science trainees will be required to serve at least 5 years as science officers or employees of the U.S. Government, either with the Armed Forces or as civilian scientists and technicians in Government agencies. A limited number of foreign students from friendly countries may be admitted to the Academy, provided they pass a proper security check. The foreign students, however, will not be required to serve the United States as in the case of our own graduates. All those enrolled at the National Science Academy, including foreign science trainees, will receive a free education, housing, medical care, and other emoluments, and will be subject to established regulations of discipline, attendance, and so forth.

As far as location of the National Science Academy is concerned, no specific site is prescribed in the bill. It is merely recommended that the Director of the National Science Foundation shall establish a commission of five members to advise on the selection of a site. In the event there is no unanimity on the part of the commission, it shall submit to the director three sites, from which he is to choose one as a permanent location. Until this is done, however, the bill advocates the use of temporary facilities for the academy so that it may begin its operations as soon as possible.

In connection with a permanent location, I merely wish to express this view: I would prefer to see a site selected in an area which provides ample space for buildings, laboratories, and other needed grounds and facilities for an institution of this kind. Perhaps the most logical choice would be in an area which is not too close to any large urban center, an area which has not yet been built up and around which could be established in time a science city with major research facilities, equipment, and housing accommodations for the students, faculty, scholars, research people, and those serving their needs. In other words, to do what we have already done at our atomic research centers.

There is no way to estimate at this time the cost of establishing a National Science Academy, but Congress can appropriate certain sums for the acquisition of land, construction of buildings and laboratories, and other needs until the institution is ready to begin functioning, and thereafter a set sum can be designated each year on the basis of needs. Unquestionably this will require many millions of dollars, but it will be a worthwhile investment for the benefit of our country and it should not be any more expensive than providing funds for existing colleges to expand their present facilities.

As for the admission of students from friendly countries, this proposal is designed to help cement stronger ties with our allies, encourage them to develop the best scientific brains, and provide them with the opportunity of giving some of their students a thorough scientific background which should prove of mutual benefit.

Obviously, an institution of this sort must be established only under Government auspices for reasons of security, national needs, financing, attracting the best qualified students, and achieving the desired results. It must be provided with the finest scientific laboratories, and the top scientists in the country should be invited to teach at the National Science Academy. An educational institution of this kind would undoubtedly arouse considerable interest among high school students throughout the country and would serve to inspire many among them to pursue a career in science or engineering.

As to the question how a National Science Academy could be more helpful than existing colleges and universities, I should like to point out the following:

First. It would assure our Armed Forces and the U.S. Government with a constant and dependable flow of highly trained manpower, with scientists, engineers, and technicians, to undertake specific tasks and duties in any emergency. These people would be required to remain in Government service, in a military or civilian capacity, for at least 5 years. In this way the Nation would benefit from their services for having provided them with a free education and a career. Graduates from existing schools and colleges are under no compulsion to render such service to the Nation.

Second. It would create a great advantage for the United States by the fact that the scientists, engineers, and technicians trained at the National Science Academy would be geared toward problems of national security, scientific research for defense, and related problems.

Third. It would provide a great incentive for American youth to strive for a career in science or engineering and the development of scientific talent. This should serve as an excellent stimulus for the growth of scientific education. Many young people, who otherwise could not afford a higher education, would now have such opportunity on the basis of merit and scientific ability.

Fourth. It would strengthen the field of scientific education by training more people skilled in the art of communicating interest in science and increasing the prestige of science teachers.

Fifth. It would prepare scientifically trained and competent people with a broad knowledge of the humanities for participation in governmental functions of a civilian nature.

Mr. Speaker, over the past year we have been constantly reminded that Russia is outstripping us in the training of scientists and engineers and that she may be gradually attaining technical supremacy. Now this fact has been verified by the President's Committee on Scientists and Engineers. There is no need to stress the importance of accelerating and expanding our science education. By now this fact is clear to all.

The establishment of a National Science Academy, such as advocated in my bill, would help relieve the existing shortage of trained manpower in this vital field, it would encourage more profound respect for science and science teachers, it would stimulate young people to pursue a career in science to a greater degree than ever before, and it would have a beneficial impact on the welfare and the security of our country.

There is a great need for such an educational institution in the country today. The urgency of the times in which we live requires it. I urge all my colleagues to support this measure.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert at this point the article from the Washington Post and Times Herald of December 31, 1958, as referred to above:

IKE WARNED ON LACK OF TRAINED MEN—COMMITTEE FEARS NATION IS FACING A GRAVE PROBLEM

(By Fred S. Hoffman)

President Eisenhower was told yesterday the United States is in danger of running low on trained manpower while the Soviet Union is driving for technical supremacy.

The President's Committee on Scientists and Engineers said it is convinced the Nation faces a grave problem in highly trained manpower during the coming decade.

Among other things, it mentioned a drop in 1958 enrollments at engineering schools. It also spoke of the prospect of a smaller group of men in the most productive age bracket in 1965, attributing this to a dip in the birth rate during the depression of the 1930's and World War II.

In its final report to Mr. Eisenhower, the committee of educators, scientists, labor union, business and Government representatives urged the White House to take responsibility for coordinating and stimulating efforts by public and private groups to meet the problem.

This was the kind of work—in the non-Federal field—assigned to the committee when it was set up in 1956, about 19 months before Russia sent aloft its first sputnik.

The Committee said the sputnik launching had sparked greater public awareness of the American scientific manpower problem. But it expressed doubt that "present public agitation reflected a real understanding of our long-term need for scientists, engineers and technicians."

"A sudden swing of the pendulum of public opinion, such as has occurred during the past year, invites a counterswing when the initial momentum is spent," the report said.

Termed disturbing was a 13 percent decrease in freshman enrollment in engineering courses this year and a 4-percent decline in total undergraduate engineering enrollment.

"At the same time," the report added, "the Soviet Union is reaffirming its intention to surpass the United States in the fields of science and technology within the next decade."

Another factor bothering the Committee, it said, was that in 1965 the "lean generation" resulting from lower birth rates in the depression and war periods will provide the country's labor force with fewer men in the 25–34 age group.

This smaller group, the report went on, will have to help support (1) an over-all population growing at the rate of almost 3 million persons a year, (2) a standard of living depending ever more on technological advances, and (3) a cold war "which does not appear to be abating."

Committee Chairman Howard L. Bevis, president emeritus of Ohio State University, said in a letter transmitting the report that certain Federal actions are "welcome evidence of the Government's practical concern and its readiness to act."

In this connection, Bevis mentioned the new National Defense Education Act, aimed at spurring scientific-technical education, and expanding programs of the U.S. Office of Education and the National Science Foundation.

"The watchword now is 'follow through'," Bevis said.

Last weekend Mr. Eisenhower announced he is creating a new Federal Council for Science and Technology. This group is intended to achieve better planning of scientific programs supported by various Government Departments, and to reduce duplication in such programs.

In doing so, Mr. Eisenhower followed a recommendation by another advisory committee made up of scientists.

Heading the list of proposals by the President's Committee on Scientists and Engineers was the recommendation for White House coordination of efforts to develop and utilize trained manpower.

The report also called for continuation of programs launched by the Committee during its 33-month existence. They are:

Sponsorship of manpower utilization clinics with participation by industry, universities, and professional societies of scientists and engineers.

Organization of State and local groups to work toward the long-range improvement of elementary and secondary school education, with main stress on science and mathematics.

Development of adequate statistical data on the supply of scientists and engineers.

Development of guidance and counseling materials concerning science and engineering careers for high school students.

Fostering wider public understanding of the need for highly qualified scientists, engineers and supporting technicians.

Federal-City Relations Vital to Whole National Economy

OF

HON. JOHN SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, not long ago the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] made a most interesting and provocative speech at the Boston convention of the American Municipal Association. The story was carried as the opening article in the January issue of the Alabama Municipal Journal, one of the very best publications of its kind in America.

I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL-CITY RELATIONS VITAL TO WHOLE NATIONAL ECONOMY

(By Hon. JOSEPH S. CLARK)

I propose to speak today about some aspects of what seems to be emerging more and more clearly as the central issue of our public life. That central issue is whether the United States is going to come to grips with the great problems of the Nation and the world, and master them—or whether we are going to fumble the ball.

Every city official in this room knows what our problems are. They are recognized, identified, admitted. They are just not being mastered.

PROBLEMS ARE NOT MASTERED

What are some of them?

National security is the most important.

The Soviet Union has attained a faster momentum than we in the race for modern weapons. That fact is recognized, identified, admitted—but not dealt with.

The Communists are making tremendous gains in their campaign to drive Western influence out of Africa and Asia. That problem is recognized, identified, admitted, but not dealt with.

Education is the next critical problem. The deterioration of our public schools, the inadequacy of our higher educational facilities, the decline of the teaching profession, our primitive failure even to build enough classrooms, the fact that hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of boys and girls who would profit from a college education won't get it, all this is recognized, identified, admitted—but it is not being mastered.

ECONOMIC SECURITY A PROBLEM

Personal economic security is a pervasive problem. The poverty of our retired citizens; their total inability, for example, to pay for medical care; the collapse last year of our unemployment compensation system—these problems are known, recognized, and admitted—yet not dealt with.

City slums are a problem every mayor knows, one that is visible, tangible, measurable, yet they are getting worse, not better, every year.

The crisis in school desegregation, the twin problems of recession and inflation, the great problems arising from metropolitan growth, of declining central cities and suburbs without adequate public services, of water resources inadequately conserved, of traffic and transportation strangulation, all these are known, recognized, admitted, but not grappled with and mastered.

LOCKED IN A COMPETITION

And so it goes. We suffer from a paralysis in our public life. The scope of our action is determined not from a forthright analysis of the facts which all admit, but by preconceived limitations growing out of inertia, timidity, and outmoded thinking.

Perhaps time was when we could sit like Ferdinand the bull, smelling flowers under a tree and still survive. But that time has gone forever. We are locked in a competition with the Soviet Union and Red China in which our very existence as well as the survival of the good society is at stake. Our adversaries can mobilize their resources in ways we can't and wouldn't if we could. We must find alternative ways of mobilizing our own resources, or the ways of freedom will be lost in a universal state ruled by international gangsters.

ALARMING SIGNS OF SOFTNESS

Let us start from the frank assumption that we may not win this fight. Twenty earlier civilizations have risen, flourished, grown soft, and been overrun by brutality and tyranny. Nor need we look far to see alarming signs of softness in America. The self-indulgence, the emphasis on luxuries, the juvenile—and adult—delinquency, the lack of self-discipline, the tendency to sweep hard facts under the rug, the unwillingness to ask the people for any sort of sacrifice—all these are danger signs.

But against these danger signs there are indications of some hope. Please believe that I do not speak as a partisan politician when I say that one such sign was the result of the last election.

A PROFOUND PUBLIC DISCONTENT

That the election returns indicate a profound public discontent with the way things are going seems clear beyond doubt. The people voted for candidates of both parties who look to the future and not the past, who represent and promise action rather than more complacency and inertia. The men who won are not happy about present day America.

The election was not a mandate to stand still. It was a mandate to move forward. It was a mandate to political leaders to get on top of our problems, to master them, to take control of our destiny.

Now, what stands in the way?

The answer we always get—whether the issue is national defense, or mutual security, or education, or housing, or urban renewal, or social security, or the development of Asia and Africa is, "We can't afford it," or "We must cut costs and balance the budget."

OUR PROBLEMS COST MONEY

Now let me admit that most, although not all, of the problems that confront us do cost money. And let me also state my own strong belief that governmental budgets at all levels, local, State, and National, should be brought into balance.

So the issue of whether we master our problems becomes, in concrete form, the issue of taxation and public spending. And that, as Walter Lippmann has said, will be the great debate of 1959.

I want to enter that debate by chopping away some of the folklore that surrounds the subject of public spending. Perhaps no topic in our time, has been the victim of so much nonsense. If we can dispel the nonsense and the fallacies, then we can put the Federal budget, as well as your city budgets, not only in perspective but in balance, and we can get ahead with the job that needs to be done.

FIVE MAIN FALLACIES

There are five main fallacies.

Fallacy No. 1 is that private spending is inherently good and public spending inherently bad—and therefore public spending should always be minimized and private spending increased to the maximum the gross national product will permit.

This fallacy is assiduously cultivated by conservative molders of opinion. The word "government" is equated with other nouns having an evil connotation—such as "waste," "extravagance," "socialism," "bureaucracy." Taxes are never referred to except as a burden. Private spending is described with fair-sounding words, such as "enterprise," "free," "competitive." The semantics are all wrong.

This is a pernicious tendency. Taxation and public spending are the means by which we divide resources between the public and private sectors of the economy. Those activities which are in the public sector are there not because they are naughty and ought to be destroyed, but because they are essential and cannot be adequately performed by private enterprise.

EXTRAVAGANCE IN GOVERNMENT

Activities in the private sector are there not because they are necessarily good and useful, but merely because they are not illegal and can be conducted at a profit.

There is, unfortunately, often extravagance in Government services, but I suspect that objective appraisal would show more in private business. Just compare, for example, the luxurious motor cars of today with the inadequate highways on which they must move; compare the extravagance of our country clubs with the spartan character of State and national parks; compare the lavishly appointed corporation and national labor union headquarters with our disgracefully rundown public buildings; compare the compensation of TV entertainers with that of great schoolteachers. We can only conclude that the private sector is comparatively plush and the public sector relatively starved. Indeed, as Prof. J. K. Galbraith has recently pointed out, the private sector of our economy is so plush that to get the private product purchased requires the strenuous efforts of huge advertising firms to create synthetic wants and needs that people do not even know they have. There is no problem at all, on the other hand, in identifying huge backlogs of essential public services for which we appear unwilling to pay the price.

WE MUST DIVERT RESOURCES

If the distribution of our national resources is to reflect the true value judgment of the American people, we must divert resources not from Government to private spending but in exactly the opposite direction.

Fallacy No. 2 is that the Federal Government is crushing the people and endangering the economy with a growing burden of taxes, expenditures, and debt, and that this threatens the health of our free enterprise system.

What is overlooked, of course, is that the ability to carry taxes and debt is related to income. Other things being equal, a man making $10,000 can pay at least twice as high taxes and carry without hardship twice as large a debt as a man making $5,000. And the same is true of the country as a whole. And taxes, expenditures, and debt are actually less today—as a proportion of gross national product—than at the end of World War II.

RATIO OF DEBT TO PRODUCT

In 1945, our gross national product was $213.6 billion, while the public debt was $278.7 billion. The ratio of the debt to the gross national product was 130 percent. In 1957, gross national product had risen to $440.3 billion, and the national debt had declined to $275 billion. The ratio of the debt to the gross national product was 63 percent.

Our debt is accordingly less than half as burdensome to the country as it was 12 years ago. Total debt has been almost stable, since the war, while the gross national product has more than doubled. The fact is that we could, if necessary, more than double our national debt and not be in any more peril of national bankruptcy than we were with the debt we carried without alarm or danger in 1946. Fortunately it isn't necessary.

TAXES PROPORTIONATELY LOWER

Similarly, Federal taxes, as a proportion of national product, are less now than they were 10 years ago, or 5 years ago, or 3 years ago. If people were going to be crushed by our present tax load, they would have been crushed long since. Lower taxes are always desirable, of course, when national needs are being met, but let us not say that there is a compelling economic necessity for reducing them. There just isn't.

This is a growing country. Our population is rising. The public services required by urbanization and national security are growing. Our civilization is becoming constantly more complex. States and localities are increasingly incapable of meeting new and growing needs. Naturally, the Federal Government should grow too. The Federal budget should rise. Given normal growth in our economy, it can increase by $3 to $4 billion annually with no change in the tax rates and no increase in the real burden—which gives us considerable room for expanding public services. And, if our public services need more than that—which I suspect they do—we can get most of it without raising tax rates by closing the outrageous tax loopholes which have made our Federal Internal Revenue Code a veritable sieve.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING NOT INFLATIONARY

Fallacy No. 3 is the notion that Federal spending is inflationary. Government spending is no more inflationary than private spending—provided the Government balances its budget. Deficit spending can be inflationary, of course, but even this is the case only when demand for goods and services exceeds supply, a condition which does not exist today.

Industry is far below capacity and unemployment is far above what it should be.

Our recent inflation arose from causes other than Federal spending. The Federal budget is being made the scapegoat by those who seize on any argument to stop Government programs which they have always opposed.

WHOSE FOOT SHOE IS ON

Fallacy No. 4 is that all Federal expenditures are alike. If a private bank makes a loan that is called an investment; if the Small Business Administration makes a loan, that is called spending. If a private power company builds a dam that is called investment; if TVA builds a dam that is called spending. One would have thought that this businessman's administration might have introduced business concepts into Government bookkeeping, but they have not done so. It may be that for bookkeeping purposes, we must continue to lump all accounts of Government disbursements together. But there is no reason why intelligent people, for purposes of public discussion, should not distinguish between operating expenses, loans which create accounts receivable, and investments which are offset by created assets, just as corporations make this distinction and just as municipalities distinguish between current and capital budgets.

SHOVING FUNCTIONS BACK TO STATE

Fallacy No. 5 is the notion that if the Federal Government shoves its functions back to the States and cities this constitutes economy. It is not economy at all if the functions are performed. The question then becomes simply which taxing system is used, and which administrative structure is employed.

There are good reasons for decentralizing administration. But that does not mean the financial burden should be thrown back on the States and cities too. The Federal tax system is far superior in justice and efficiency to those of State and local governments, and there is great merit in using it for urban functions. Taxpayers cannot threaten to flee the Nation, as they can and do the city and State. The Federal tax burden falls evenly across the land, based in large part on ability to pay. There is every reason to use it in preference to State and local systems where the choice exists.

I shall oppose proposals to turn Federal functions back to the States and cities. This would result in crippling essential functions. Important services now being rendered would be abandoned. An unjust tax system would be substituted for a better one.

I will press for Federal help in new fields, especially education. I hope the mayors of America will join me in these stands as they have done so effectively in the past.

The Federal Government must give greater, not less, support to the urban areas of America, because the great domestic problems of the second half of the 20th century are urban problems. We are no longer an agricultural society.

NO DEPARTMENT FOR CITIES

This brings me to my final point. A visitor from outer space, looking at the structure of our Federal Government, would conclude that America is still a rural nation. We have a Department of Agriculture, which devotes itself to the problems of the farm. We have a Department of Interior which reflects the interests and needs of the more-sparsely settled States. But there is no department with responsibility for the problems of the tens of millions of people living in forced congestion in sprawling metropolitan areas—one of which stretches unbroken all the way from Portland, Maine to Alexandria, Va. City people, too, need an advocate in Washington.

To illustrate: The Senate became disturbed last year about the plight of the Nation's railroads. The Department of Commerce was concerned; so was the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commerce Committee of the Senate has a standing subcommittee with jurisdiction over railroads. So it organized a study.

Those of us who have been worried about a related problem—namely, the plight of the commuter and the deterioration of mass transit in the cities—tried to make sure that urban mass transit problems would be covered in the general study that was organized. The answer was "No." States rights intervened.

MASS TRANSIT A REAL PROBLEM

No department of the Government has any interest in what should be done about commuter transportation services. No committee or subcommittee of the Congress has any jurisdiction.

Yet you know that mass transit is not merely a State and local problem. Much of the traffic crosses State lines. Some of the railroads involved serve many States. Let's face it, State and local governments are incapable of dealing successfully with this problem in most localities—just as urban renewal was generally beyond their competence until the Federal Government stepped in to help.

Maybe the ultimate answer is that mass transit should not be a Federal problem, even in part. Maybe the same applies to air and stream pollution, and water supply. But what concerns me most is that, at the present time, we have no mechanism even for examining such problems comprehensively and making intelligent national decisions.

DEPARTMENT OF URBAN AFFAIRS

I believe the first step should be the creation of a Department of Urban Affairs at Cabinet level with the responsibility of keeping abreast of urban and metropolitan problems and developing recommendations for Federal, State, and local action. The Department would represent the urban viewpoint in the administration of nationwide programs which particularly affect cities and their suburbs, notably, highways and water conservation. It would be assigned initially, at least, only those operating programs which are peculiarly urban, and these are clustered already in the Housing and Home Finance Agency. But the Department, to my mind, would be something far beyond the present HHFA. The additional element would be a hunting license to study, research, and recommend, and a responsibility to listen to representatives of groups like this one, understand their problems, and reflect that understanding in the policy forming processes within the executive branch. Urban extension is a procedure and a program we could well adopt from our agricultural friends.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS EVOLVE

I have seen the criticism that a new department should not be formed until a philosophy of Federal-State-local relations is developed and agreed upon as the new Department's basis. Personally, I think the logic points in just the opposite direction. Governmental philosophies do not spring full blown into being; they evolve. But they cannot evolve unless someone in Government has responsibility for thinking creatively about them. We will get the philosophy far quicker if we establish the mechanism first.

Some of us in the Senate who are former mayors put in a bill 2 years ago to create a new Department of Housing and Urban Affairs. We will do so again in January, and I hope the mayors of America will make the enactment of this bill an important policy objective and give us their full support as we attempt to push this bill through the various stages on the long road toward enactment.

Treatment Plant Construction Program

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, a recent poll of the Nation's 52 State and territorial health officers shows that by an overwhelming majority—82 percent—they believe the current Federal sewage treatment plant construction grant program has resulted in stimulation of sewage plant construction. Their views are backed up by the facts which show that construction of sewage treatment works—the Nation's worst public works problem—has risen steadily during the course of the construction grants program.

Contract awards in 1957 rose to $351 million and are expected to reach at least $390 million in 1958. The 1952–56 average was $222 million. Total construction of treatment plants reached an all-time national high in 1958 with over one-third of the projects constructed in that year receiving Federal grants. Moreover, at least 35 States experienced their highest treatment plant construction levels in 1957 or 1958.

The results of this poll of the Nation's health officials shows that three-fourths of them favor doubling the authorization of construction grant allocations. These same officials, it must be remembered, opposed the adoption of this grant program when it was first proposed in 1956. But in overwhelming numbers they now favor the program and what is more recommend additional Federal participation. On this, too, they are well supported by the facts.

A recent survey of State and Territorial sanitary engineers indicates the estimated sewage treatment construction program of 40 States for the next 3 years could utilize approximately twice the Federal grant money authorized for the next 3 years under Public Law 660. According to this survey, the estimated cost of sewage treatment plant construction requirements for the next 3 years is approximately $540 million per year. The average annual Federal contribution to maintain this level of construction is estimated in the survey to be approximately $100 million per year, or twice the current authorized Federal level of participation.

Despite the success of the treatment plant construction program and its endorsement by State health officials the President has recommended that it be repealed. According to the President's budget message his administration supports programs necessary to stimulate greater State and local effort in areas of "critical national concern" but has consistently endeavored to strengthen our system of government "by encouraging State and local governments to assume responsibility for many public needs which they can provide well without relying on Federal aid at all." To further this worthy objective the President would discontinue Federal grants for waste treatment works construction and adjust Federal revenue laws as recommended by the Joint Federal-State Action Committee so the States can assume full responsibility for these programs starting in fiscal year 1961.

What the President has done is pick what has been termed the Nation's "worst public works problem" by Fortune magazine and single it out for the budget ax on the pretext of strengthening Federal-State relations. He has picked a program that was enacted in the first place because it was needed to stimulate greater State and local effort in an area of "critical national concern," namely, pollution control, and which has proved to be such a successful stimulant that over 80 percent of the Nation's health officers who 2½ years ago opposed it today agree that it has resulted in stimulation of sewage plant construction within their jurisdictions. The President's own adviser for public works, Gen. J. S. Bragdon, has stated that:

> To meet our needs for water, conservation is the order of the day. We cannot manufacture this necessity of life. We must store it and use it more efficiently, learn to convert saline waters and find ways to improve the distribution of it. Most important of all, our rivers will have to be cleaned, and adequate treatment facilities installed to prevent upstream pollution. To accomplish this job, we need almost 8,000 municipal plants alone, and in all, some 17,000 facilities, public and private, to insure that all of the potential sources of pollution are adequately controlled.

Obviously, here is an area of critical national concern where State and local efforts have lagged the past 20 years making necessary the program now in operation to stimulate greater State and local effort. No wonder 48 out of 50 State health officers have come out in opposition to the President's recommendation to repeal the existing program. No wonder the President's own Water Pollution Control Advisory Board, in an almost unheard-of action, unanimously refused to endorse his recommendations.

Who agrees with the President on this issue? The Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the National Association of Manufacturers were his sole supporters when hearings were held on the subject last year by the Public Works Committee. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that I have never been able to fully understand the position taken by the Chamber and the NAM on this issue. Water is essential to industry. By 1975 industry will be using 215 billion gallons a day. Sixty-two percent of the Nation's water used will be in industry. To make a ton of steel alone requires 65,000 gallons of water. Industry has more at stake here than any other element of our economy and yet their national organizations oppose measures designed to assure that the quality of our water supply will be adequate for industrial as well as other uses. To encourage industry to join with others in combating pollution, I have introduced legislation today providing fast tax writeoffs for industrial waste treatment facilities which may be constructed in the future.

At the same time I have introduced a bill to increase the Federal grant program under Public Law 660 in order to further stimulate local effort to increase the level of treatment plant construction so that it more closely meets the proven needs of the country.

My bill would amend section 6 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act by authorizing:

First. Grants for projects in the amount of 30 percent of the estimated reasonable cost thereof or $500,000, whichever is the smaller. Under existing law the maximum grant is 30 percent of the cost or $250,000, whichever is the smaller. Experience has shown that there has been less stimulation of construction in the larger communities subject to the $250,000 limitation than in those eligible for the full 30 percent grant. Because of this limitation, there is insufficient incentive to larger communities which are at the same time often major contributors to pollution. Increasing the maximum grant limit to $500,000 should tend to stimulate more projects from the larger communities, thus giving State pollution control authorities an opportunity to bring their programs into better balance by accelerating construction in the larger as well as in the smaller communities.

Second. Municipalities to join together to build joint treatment facilities with the amount of grant allocable to each community as if it were a separate project. Under existing law each project is limited to the maximum grant of $250,000 or 30 percent of the cost, whichever is the smaller. Experience indicates that if communities which join together could receive a larger grant the program would have a greater stimulatory effect on such communities. Often the construction of such joint facilities is the most economical and efficient method of providing adequate sewage treatment and is generally encouraged by consulting engineers and the States. This amendment would give the States greater latitude in determining the use of funds within their States and authorizes an allocation to each municipality involved in a joint project its share of the estimated reasonable cost rather than limiting the project, as under present law, to a single maximum grant.

Third. Reallocation of grant funds from States not using funds because of lack of projects to States having projects approved for which grants have not been made because of lack of funds. Experience under the present act indicates that a number of jurisdictions have not been able to use their funds because of lack of eligible projects. On the other hand, many States have backlogs of projects considerably in excess of their Federal allotments. This amendment would permit a reallocation of funds from jurisdictions which cannot use them to jurisdictions having projects for which grants are not made because of lack of funds. This will stimulate additional construction in the States having the greatest demonstrated need.

Fourth. One hundred million dollars for construction grants each year for 10 years. Present law provides for $50 million a year for 10 years for Federal construction grants. Even this amount has resulted in tremendous plant construction stimulation, but it is not enough. The level of construction is reaching the $400 million mark, but our yearly needs are nearer $600 million. In order to stimulate construction up to this level it is necessary to restore the Federal construction program to amount I originally proposed in 1956 and which was cut in half. I said then that we were creating a program with one leg amputated before it had even learned to walk. On one leg the program is walking well but we need to restore the other leg so it can run the pollution problem right into the ground.

My bill also provides for the establishment of an Office of Water Pollution Control within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. At the present time the Federal water pollution control program is administered by the Water Supply and Water Pollution Control Program Section of the Division of Sanitary Engineering Services of the Bureau of the State Services of the Public Health Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. These men are doing a superb, dedicated job but the morass of the administrative framework within which they work cannot help but stifle and restrict their activities. The Committee on Public Works has stated explicitly that:

> It intends to watch carefully the progress and development of the national water-pollution control program and particularly the supporting role of the Federal Government.

In a committee report in 1956 it was stated:

> The committee believes that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare should place a high priority on the objectives of the program authorized by the bill (Federal Water Pollution Control Act of 1956) and will diligently carry out its role in this Federal-State cooperative activity by providing a constructive program within an appropriate administrative framework.

Mr. Speaker, that appropriate administrative framework has not as yet been established by administrative action. Legislation is therefore needed. Control of pollution is part and parcel of the overall water resources problem. Pollution simply means that waste has built up beyond the water's capacity to carry it. Therefore, one of water's essential uses is curtailed and what is more its availability for other uses reduced at the same time. This affects industry, agriculture, fish and wildlife, and our health as well. The control of pollution is no longer concerned merely with the correction of sanitary nuisances but rather with the conservation of a great and precious resource—water.

The existing administrative framework within which the pollution control program operates must, therefore, be broadened and expanded so that the proper emphasis can be placed on all aspects of the problem—engineering, legal, research, construction, economic, and health. At the urging and by request of the Nation's great conservation organizations, women's clubs, and many others, and in the interests of good government, I recommend the establishment of an Office of Water Pollution Control within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare so that an all-out attack, at all levels of government can begin against the pollution problem which threatens our health, reduces available water supplies and restricts economic growth and expansion.

Priority for Starving Americans

OF
HON. JOHN M. SLACK, JR.
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. SLACK. Mr. Speaker, the development of our national affairs through the activities of the Congress occasionally produces such a great contrast between the issues under discussion and the immediate requirements of some sections of our population that it becomes necessary to pause and take notice of a paradox of our own creation. In recent days the United States has greeted two important visitors—Mr. Mikoyan, the Deputy Premier of the Soviet Union and Mr. Arturo Frondizi, President of Argentina. I recognize the need for our country to treat important foreign visitors with courtesy and good manners and to assist our friends in foreign lands to the maximum of our capabilities. The contrast between the discussions in these Chambers at the time our famous visitors were at hand, and the things I have seen with my own eyes, in my own district, within the past few days, is so great, however, that it is necessary in defense of the principles of democracy and fair play on which this Nation was founded for me to bring certain matters to the attention of this House.

During the visit of Mr. Mikoyan we were advised through press reports that he was greeted with mixed emotions in several of our major cities and in five of them his party was showered with eggs. When Mr. Frondizi spoke before this House he paid us many compliments as a nation and told us a great deal about the misery of his native land, and about our share in the responsibility for the correction of that misery.

He said:

> We cannot ignore the fact that millions of human beings in Latin America suffer from misery and backwardness. A stagnant and impoverished country cannot uphold democratic institutions. On the contrary, it is a fertile soil for anarchy and dictatorship.

Following the visits of these two men I took a trip myself, back to my own congressional district. The trip was planned as a result of numerous communications which I had received from businessmen, labor leaders and public officials describing in detail the economic disasters which had fallen upon the people whom I was elected to represent. I visited the coal fields of the southern Appalachian area, much of which lies within my congressional district.

In the coal fields of my district there are over 30,000 unemployed receiving unemployment compensation and 40,000 who have long exhausted their unemployment benefits, and who have not been employed in a productive manner for 2 years or more. They and their families are subject to the degradation of living on the combination of charity and surplus agricultural commodities.

They have seen the number of employed miners in West Virginia decline from 125,000 in 1948, to 47,000 today, and they have no illusions about the future.

Their children exist on a skid-row diet of corn meal, rice and whatever else the surplus commodities warehouse has available. These children never have any meat, and have seldom seen a fresh egg during the past 2 years. They envy the children who are so amply blessed with good food that they can afford to throw eggs at foreign visitors. The parents told me that even today they only receive enough food for 3 weeks out of the month under all of the existing aid programs—that their diet contains only one-third of the calories and proteins needed to sustain life. So the children weaken a little, and their parents are condemned to watch these future citizens shrink in vitality and hope, day by day.

They cannot afford to worry over the race to control outer space, the competition for the minds and loyalties of men, or the role of American leadership in the free world.

As for their children; can you develop a nuclear physicist out of a child who had no shoes and was forced to quit school in the fourth grade? Will you draw tomorrow's space pilots from among these who have had no orange juice or milk or eggs for over a year?

These are not the people of India or the masses of Chinese I am talking about; these are Americans—strong and self-reliant and skillful in their trade. They are disciplined to work in teams, and are renowned for their courage in a realm of industrial activity which is very dangerous under the best conditions. When they have work to do, they arise in the morning and enter the mouth of a coal pit to spend the day underground, beset by the dangers of gas and cave-ins more hazardous than fire and flood—dangers which few people, including myself, would care to face as a daily ration.

Their situation is not new, it has been growing cumulatively for several years. What have we done about it? We have done nothing of any practical benefit. These miners are the victims of several circumstances—for one, a trade policy that whittles away their livelihood in exchange for doubtful gains in foreign popularity. For another, they are the victims of technological advances which replace the miner with the machine. There is no disposition here to argue against automation or mechanization in the coal fields. We cannot stop progress, and those of us with business experience know that mechanization is necessary for competitive reasons.

But the miners have been displaced through the operations of American industrial ingenuity to create a more competitive end product and a more attractive price for the consumer. In other words, mechanization has been in the general public interest, but the miner and his family are being destroyed. So, they have given up everything, either for theoretical advances in international good will on the one hand, or a public benefit through lower cost to the consumer on the other.

In return they have received nothing but the right to starve and to see their children die before their eyes. This is a situation which cannot be permitted to continue, and I say it is the responsibility of this Congress to return to them an opportunity to live like American citizens, to lend a hand in their economic reconstruction, to see that this Nation does not take away everything and return nothing from any body of its citizens. If we do not take care of our own in circumstances as dire as these, how can we expect to earn respect in foreign lands? If these conditions are permitted to continue in this area of industrial operation, what confidence will our own people in other areas have in us and our way of life? Automation and mechanization will sooner or later enter all types of industrial activity. The coal miner has been struck first and struck hardest, but he will not be the last to be driven to his knees by the random progress of science. Industrial progress has created among the miners a permanent disaster. This is not a natural disaster of storm or flood, but it is a disaster nonetheless, and cries out for disaster relief.

I realize that this is not the first time this matter has been brought to the attention of the House, but the situation grows worse every day, and there is no sign of strong interest or concerted activity on behalf of those affected. What is necessary to stir us to action? Is it necessary to fill the gallery with half-starved men and women? Is it necessary to have a repetition of some dreadful enterprise like the depression bonus march on Washington? Will we not take forthright action until the pot boils over and the starving thousands descend upon us to parade the coldheartedness of their Government before the leaders of the world? There have been bills introduced before this House—thousands of bills—covering a great variety of subjects, but no pending measure merits consideration ahead of the lives and hopes of those who have given up everything in the advancement of the public interest.

We have before us for consideration measures to aid distressed areas, to increase the flow of surplus agricultural commodities, to institute a program of coal research, and other proposals which will give both immediate and lasting relief to the people of the coalfields. They must get priority. A distressed-areas bill was passed by the last Congress and vetoed by the President. This time it must be passed with an overwhelming majority, sufficient to defy the veto threat implied in the President's message. If I could assemble the membership of this House in a single vehicle, and take you with me through the coalfields of my district, and allow you to spend a day looking at the sum total of human misery which has resulted from prevailing conditions, I doubt that there would be a single opposing vote for any measure which would better the situation.

The subject is not one for debate. There is nothing to debate. The last and best hope for these people rests in the power and authority of this Congress. They have seen Development Loan Funds established to assist the backward people of Asia, Africa, and the Middle East, with authority to spend $625 million for that purpose during the current fiscal year. At the same time they remember that a measure costing half as much, which would have given them hope and sustenance, failed of passage over a veto, and they were left with nothing.

The gaunt figure of the starving miner who stands idle is a mockery of the image of America as the land of abundance. If there is to be a showdown then, let it come quickly. Every day of delay means another day on which 100,000 children face the morning on a breakfast of cornmeal and water, or with no breakfast at all.

I urge a quick consideration of the measures that will afford relief. I appeal to your generosity and sympathy. I challenge your native pride in the country we are all sworn to protect and defend.

The conditions that exist, left unattended, will brew the devil's broth of disloyalty and furnish fertile grounds for the disease of disbelief in our way of life.

It may be said that these are hard words, but this is a condition which defies words. Its solution rests solely in the source of all laws—the Congress of the United States. I appeal to you to make it your primary concern, even as it is mine.

President's Approach on Agricultural Legislation Is Sound

OF
HON. WILLIAM C. CRAMER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, the President's recommendations for new farm legislation, which were transmitted to the Congress today, make sense. We all know that the present price support and production control program is not working. The program has been costly to taxpayers; it has not helped the farmers who need help the most, the little fellow; and it has stimulated production of tremendous surpluses that will be a millstone around the neck of agriculture for a long time to come. The President offers solutions to the most pressing farm problems. I sincerely hope that his suggestions can be enacted into law during this session of the Congress.

It would take too long to discuss all the difficulties now faced by agriculture. Therefore, I am going to zero in on just one facet of the overall agricultural situation, the burdensome surpluses of farm products under the control of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

At the end of November the Corporation's investment in commodity inventories amounted to about $8.3 billion, which is not far under the record $8.9 billion established in early 1956. The Department of Agriculture estimates that a new record investment of $9.1 billion will be set by this coming July 1. And by July 1, 1960, the Department says, about $10.5 billion could be tied up in commodity stocks.

At the end of this past November the Corporation's investment in price support—inventory stocks plus nonrecourse loans extended on price supported commodities—amounted to about $8.3 billion. The record was $8.9 billion, reached early in 1956. Now the Department of Agriculture estimates that a new record investment of $9.1 billion will be set by this coming July 1. And by July 1, 1960, the Department says, about $10.5 billion could be tied up in commodity surpluses.

Let us take a close look at the makeup of the November 1958 commodity stockpile.

In November the Commodity Credit Corporation had over $6 billion tied up in four grains—wheat, corn, grain sorghums, and barley. The total for upland cotton was $873 million. Tobacco accounted for another $616 million. The investment in only six commodities, therefore, was $7.5 billion—or 91 percent of the total outlay.

Do these figures not support the President's contention that most of the price-support dollars are now being channeled to producers of a few crops? Not only do the dollars go to producers of a few crops, but they also go to big producers of the few supported crops. For example, for producers having allotments of 100 acres or more, net budgetary expenditures per farm for the present fiscal year are, for wheat, $7,000 per farm; cotton, $10,000; and rice, $10,000. While all this was going on farmers producing unsupported commodities, such as cattle, hogs, poultry, fruits, vegetables, and many other essential farm products, have experienced growing markets rather than a buildup of stocks in warehouses.

There is enough wheat in this country right now to fill all available outlets at present price levels for 2 full years, with a carryover of about 300 million bushels left over as a start on the third year. The feed grain supply also is moving toward unmanageable levels. Crops of 1958 corn, grain sorghums, barley, and soybeans were all at record highs. Added to big carryovers, these 1958 crops meant record total supplies, both in volume and in supply per animal unit. The bulk of the surplus stocks are owned by the Government.

But, whether a surplus is in Government bins or in private hands, it puts pressure on market prices. And it costs money—large sums of money—to store farm products. At the present time storage costs are well in excess of a million dollars a day. There is always the danger of loss through deterioration or spoilage. That is especially true of such perishable products as butter and cheese.

The President's suggestions encompass two basic steps aimed at solving the surplus problem. First, his program would cut down surpluses which already have accumulated; and, second, it charts sound policies which will avoid building up new surpluses. The President's program is a sound program. I endorse it. I am sure that the Congress will endorse it.

The Education of Our Children Is of National Concern, and if They Are Not Educated Properly, It Is a National Calamity

OF
HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 29, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, President Eisenhower said at his White House press conference on July 31, 1957, that:

> The education of our children is of national concern and if they are not educated properly it is a national calamity.

Fred M. Hechinger, a past president of the Education Writers Association, wrote an article which he titled the "Five Basic Problems of Education" and which appeared as the lead article in the New York Times magazine of January 25, 1959. The New York Times is to be congratulated for its generosity in giving so much space to a discussion of this vital subject by a former education editor of the New York Herald Tribune.

It must be said of Mr. Hechinger's article, I think, that it almost entirely ignores the vital point that inadequate pay is the fundamental reason why better people do not become teachers and why so many competent people leave the profession. This view was expressed repeatedly by the many distinguished witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee of the House of Representatives during the 85th Congress.

Similarly, the Rockefeller report on education (p. 25) declares that:

> The root problem of the teaching profession remains financial * * * until we pay teachers at least as well as the middle echelon of executives we cannot expect the profession to attract its full share of the available range of talents. Salaries must be raised immediately and substantially.

Since Mr. Hechinger's article is in all other respects such a timely and incisive discussion of American education, I include it for the information of my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced three major bills designed to assist in solving the basic problems of education. H.R. 284 would amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 to provide for 20,000 national defense scholarships and for other purposes.

President Eisenhower called for 10,000 scholarships during the 85th Congress. The House provided these but they were dropped by the Senate.

A preference for science and mathematics written into the National Defense Education Act would be modified by H.R. 284 to give equal weight to the other disciplines including the humanities.

Repeal of the loyalty oath is provided in the H.R. 284; however the measure also calls for an affirmative oath of allegiance. Many educational leaders believe the present requirement of a loyalty oath, applying as it does to a large number of young people and teachers, is thoroughly harmful since it singles out people in education as objects of suspicion. Further, the present act tragically stifles the free exchange of ideas in the classroom and leads to complete stultification of the educational process.

My second bill, H.R. 965, provides financial assistance for the support of public schools by appropriating funds to the States to be used for constructing school facilities and for teachers' salaries.

Federal grants to the States would be on the basis of each State's school-age population and would amount to $25 per child during the first year, $50 the second, $75 the third, and $100 for the fourth and succeeding years. Written into the bill is the assurance that no department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over policy determination, personnel, curriculum, program of instruction, or the administration of any school or school system. To make sure that the States and local school districts do not slacken their own efforts, the bill provides for a reduction of the grants if a State's educational program is below the national average. The effective date of this reduction provision would be delayed for 3 years to give State legislatures two sessions to work on their programs.

Federal officials have estimated that we are short 140,000 classrooms and 135,000 teachers. It is a shocking thing to realize that only one-half cent of every Federal tax dollar goes to support public schools. This must be compared with the 43 cents out of every local tax dollar and the 31 cents out of every State tax dollar which goes to public education. Our schoolchildren must have the support of the one level of government which to date has been resting on its oars where education is concerned—the Federal Government. It is time that we began putting first things first. A nation which does not put a top priority on education will not remain a first-class power very long. At the present time we have launched a multi-billion-dollar Federal roadbuilding program; we spend $40 billion plus on defense, and several million dollars apiece for our missiles. Our citizens spend hundreds of millions of dollars each year on liquor, tobacco, advertising, automobiles, and other luxuries. Our materialistic culture can and it must find funds for education which is essential to our survival as a free nation.

My third bill, H.R. 2440, amends the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide funds for educational purposes by providing increased incentives for private giving through the allowance of a tax credit for charitable contributions to institutions of higher education.

The following letter explains the purposes of H.R. 2440 in detail:

JANUARY 23, 1959.

Mr. EDMUND J. GLEAZER,
Executive Director, American Association of Junior Colleges, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. GLEAZER: I have your letter expressing interest in my bill, H.R. 2440, to provide increased incentives for private giving to colleges and universities, and asking for a statement regarding it.

This measure follows the recommendations of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and the resolution adopted by the Association of American Colleges at its convention in Miami, Fla., last year. Many other organizations have called for increased private giving including the Council for Financial Aid to Education, the National Planning Association, and the recently established Independent College

Funds of America consisting of 40 State and regional organizations representing 467 colleges and universities. Most corporations and individuals conspicuously fail to contribute the sums permitted under the present tax laws. In fact, it is the failure of the present tax laws to realize the sums necessary which has led to H.R. 2440 and the other bills in the Congress to increase private and public funds for educational purposes.

H.R. 2440 would allow a taxpayer a credit against income tax for charitable contributions made to institutions of higher education. In the case of an individual taxpayer, the limit on this credit would be the same as the present limit on the deduction for charitable contributions. H.R. 2440 would not give him a tax benefit with respect to more contributions than he may now include for deduction purposes alone; he may elect to treat a charitable contribution (if it is to an educational institution) as a credit rather than as a deduction, but the total of credit plus deduction is no greater than the present allowable total of deductions.

In the case of a corporate taxpayer, the limit on this credit would be increased from 5 percent to 10 percent of taxable income (where the percentage-of-taxable-income method of computing the limit is used), and this credit would be in addition to the deduction presently allowed for charitable contributions generally; a corporation may elect to treat charitable contributions to educational institutions as credits rather than as deductions (up to 10 percent) without cutting into the amount of such contributions (along with other types of charitable contributions) which may be allowed as deductions. Of course, the same contribution cannot be counted as a credit and a deduction.

Under H.R. 2440 the taxpayer would be allowed a 2-year carryover on the credit just as he is presently allowed a 2-year carryover for deduction purposes. The Secretary of the Treasury would be directed to prescribe regulations governing the time and manner of making the election to treat a contribution as a credit rather than a deduction and imposing conditions to ensure the effective correlation of the new credit section with the existing deduction provisions.

I am sending along two copies of H.R. 2440 for your use.

Cordially yours,

FRANK THOMPSON, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

FIVE BASIC PROBLEMS OF EDUCATION

(By Fred M. Hechinger)

Ever since the cold war moved into outer space, the American people have been concerned about education. No longer is the sky the limit; even the moon is only a whistlestop. And in the futuristic contest, the classrooms are the launching platform.

Hardly a week passes without several television programs peeking behind the scenes of education. Not long ago, a broadcaster cornered a few high school students, and their deplorable ignorance set off a national storm of criticism. The Rockefeller report on education got top billing on the front pages of even small-town dailies. Rear Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, father of the atomic submarine, received a sympathetic public ear when he proclaimed that, if the money for education could not be found in the Federal budget, the defense appropriation should be cut.

President Eisenhower appointed a special Committee on Education Beyond High School. The Ford Foundation made the largest gift in the history of private philanthropy for the increase of professors' salaries. James Bryant Conant, Harvard's former president, has devoted the past 2 years to an attempt to find out what is wrong with American high school education. In fact, the Conant report, which is set for publication next Wednesday, has already stirred up more excitement than many Government white papers.

Everybody is concerned about education; but education is an elusive, amorphous thing. Before it can be understood and improved, some of the crucial problems must be singled out and defined. As an observer of the educational scene, I have visited classrooms, talked with teachers, listened to parents, sat through speeches and conventions, scanned the statistics and studied the reports.

Let me set down what seem the five most immediate problems; then let us see what the experts recommend.

THE PROBLEM

1. How can American standards of education be raised, and what, especially, can be done to meet the challenge of the exceptionally gifted child?

American democracy promises every child a full elementary and secondary education, but the unanswered question has always been how to do this without surrendering to the lowest common denominator. Our educational laissez-faire, which permits even able students to pick elective snap courses, has allowed standards to slip.

The raising of educational standards for the great mass of students would mean a spectacular improvement in the country's total reservoir of skills. But what about the small number of exceptionally gifted children—the top 2 percent? The talents of these, if lost, are irreplaceable. In terms of the country's progress and of competitive coexistence in a cold war period, they may well hold the key.

THE PROPOSED SOLUTIONS

There is almost unanimous agreement that the search for quality in a system of quantity rates first attention. To cope with the problem of a curriculum which has been loaded down with an almost unlimited variety of subjects from driver education to citizenship training, the Rockefeller report, entitled "The Pursuit of Excellence," demands that "we reach some agreement on priorities in subject matter." Educators are asked to make up their minds which of the many elective courses are most important.

The Conant report will go a step further. It will clearly demand that all high school students complete 4 years of English, 3 to 4 years of history and related social studies, 1 year of mathematics and 1 year of science. Students in the top 20 percent would take 3 additional years of science, 3 more years of mathematics and at least 3 years of 1 foreign language.

For all students there must be improved guidance. Dr. Conant asks for 1 guidance counselor for every 250 to 300 high school students. And, in order to assure adequate programs and facilities, he asks for elimination, through consolidation, of all high schools with graduating classes of fewer than 100 students.

All proposals for the improvement of education demand a greater sense of continuity of subjects and a greater scope of understanding. Study of a foreign language for less than 3 years, says Dr. Conant, is like drilling for oil and then stopping before striking it. In the study of history, too, efforts are largely wasted unless there is a sense of the natural sequence of events.

For the 2 percent of gifted pupils, even more of a concession to the difference in human talent must be made. "A school system that insists on the same instruction for the talented, average and below average child," said Rear Admiral Rickover, "may prevent as many children from growing intellectually as would a system that excludes children because of the social, political or economic status of their parents. Neither system is democratic."

The experts agree. "Any educational system is, among other things, a great sorting-out process," says the Rockefeller report. But while the European sorting out is achieved almost entirely by impersonal examinations, the American experts call for a variety of tests, some scoring native talent, others the actual achievement of the student, with personal observation and guidance. Once the gifted students are recognized, the experts want them to be given advanced work, without separating them from their classmates.

Toward the end of high school the extra work would be increased. Thus, juniors and seniors would be offered college-level instruction in some subjects, as they now are under the advanced placement program sponsored by the college-entrance examination board. Another program for early admission to college, initiated by the Fund for the Advancement of Education and hailed by all the experts, has sent more than 1,000 gifted students to college during the past 5 years without completion of the last year or two of high school.

THE PROBLEM

2. How can we get better teachers?

There is no way to improve the quality of American education without an adequate supply of good teachers. Already a serious shortage of highly educated manpower exists. This shortage will become increasingly critical unless we find enough of what the Ford Foundation calls the seed corn—teachers who, through their superior efforts, help to raise new generations of educated brains.

Perhaps even worse, the standards set for the teachers are often pitifully low. For example, at a convention in Bowling Green, Ohio, recently, an education spokesman demanded that chemistry teachers be given at least 32 hours of college study in that subject. A Russian student in a college-preparatory high school, by comparison, gets more than 340 hours of chemistry before graduation.

THE PROPOSED SOLUTIONS

"No educational system can be better than its teachers," warns the Rockefeller report. It estimates that the number of new teachers needed in the next decade is somewhere between one-third and one-half of all college graduates in that period. The present ratio of college graduates entering the teaching profession is only one out of every four or five. And yet, even today, the report warns, the problem of quality is critical. As of 1956, 33 percent of all elementary teachers did not hold an A.B. degree, while more than 21 percent of all public school teachers had less than 4 years of college.

Since the training of all teachers depends on the quality of the training of college teachers, there is special significance in a report by the National Education Association that "since 1953–54, holders of the doctor's degree among newly employed, full-time [college] teachers have decreased 25.2 percent." And the manpower pressures of the immediate future may make this situation even worse.

The Rockefeller report calls for an improvement in the courses and training procedures given teachers. "If the programs for the preparation of teachers are rigid, formalistic and shallow, they will drive away minds as fast as they are recruited," it warns. "Unhappily, preparation for precollege teaching has come all too close to that condition."

The report warns against the practice of handling teachers as "interchangeable units in an educational assembly line." At present, "the best teacher and the poorest in a school may teach the same grade and subject, use the same textbook, handle the same number of students, get paid the same salaries, and rise in salary at the same speed to the same ceiling." The ironic result is that school administration—and the end of active teaching—often becomes the only refuge for able teachers who want to advance their careers.

The problem of getting a sufficient number of teachers is primarily one of recruiting and of offering an attractive career. "But even with aggressive recruitment there appears to be little or no likelihood that we can bring into teaching at any level anything approaching the number of qualified and gifted teachers we need," says the Rockefeller report. "We must therefore utilize our superior teachers more effectively."

All the experts agree that, in the words of the Rockefeller report, "one way to make better use of the ablest teachers is to eliminate many of the petty tasks which occupy a teacher's time. Less highly trained classroom assistants may accomplish much in the lightening of this burden." The Fund for the Advancement of Education, putting this theory to the test in Bay City, Mich., found it successful, and it has spread from there to many communities across the country. A bonus, it was found, came when many of the aides, seeing teaching at its best, became so interested that they went back to college to get their teacher training.

Other experiments have been sparked by the success of the first one. The use of teams of teachers, made up of 1 master teacher, 1 regular teacher, and 1 untrained assistant has made it possible to increase the class size for some subjects to 3 times a normal classroom quota, while, at other times, permitting 1 teacher to work with only 8 to 12 pupils. The use of television has also made it possible to get more of the best teachers into contact with more students.

THE PROBLEM

3. Should we emphasize science as against the liberal arts?

However we respond to the challenge of sputnik or speculate about the importance of moon shoots, one fact is inescapable—science and technology are intimately linked with modern man's destiny.

Traditionally, there used to be a clear dividing line between the liberal arts and the sciences. The high school student who thought he had no interest in a career of science frequently was allowed to get by with a minimum of mathematics and science instruction. Reports about the Russian schools, which go to the opposite extreme of requiring a stiff dose of science and mathematics for all high school students, have intensified the problem of just how much science training should be required of every high school graduate.

THE PROPOSED SOLUTIONS

The experts agree on two fundamental points: (1) that, despite the panic headlines, science must not crowd out the humanities; (2) that it is vital for all students, not just the scientifically inclined, to have a thorough measure of basic mathematics and science.

On the first point, the President's Committee on Education Beyond High School says that the country "would be inexcusably blind if it failed to see that the challenge of the next 20 years will require leaders not only in science and engineering and in business and industry, but in government and politics, in foreign affairs and diplomacy, in education and civic affairs."

On the second point, Dr. I. I. Rabi, Nobel Prize physicist and chairman of the President's Science Advisory Committee, says: "We must teach science as an intellectual pursuit rather than as a body of tricks." And he adds: "As yet, if a man has no feeling for art he is considered narrow-minded, but if he has no feeling for science, he is considered quite normal. This is a fundamental weakness."

Probably the greatest waste of scientific talent stems from social clichés which discourage girls from studying science and mathematics as "unladylike." Dr. Conant found that, even in the best high schools, fewer than half of the gifted girls elect 4 years of mathematics.

The experts agree that it is not a question of "either-or" between science and the liberal arts. The Rockefeller report warns as much against the narrowly trained scientist as against the educated man who is illiterate in science.

THE PROBLEM

4. Who should go to college?

Already more than 3 million young Americans are enrolled in college—a total of one-third of the eligible age group. Is universal college the next step, following the universal high school? Some State universities have, in practice, accepted this principle; they consider a high school diploma an automatic admission ticket. Other college spokesmen warn against the danger of indiscriminate admission policies as an invitation to lowered standards. They are, however, more concerned that rising costs will price the colleges out of the market for many able students.

One fact is clear: Even if the present policy of selection is continued, most colleges would have to double or triple in size by 1975 in order to accommodate the same percentage of students who go to college today.

No expert wants to restrict college admission, but all would like to see standards raised so that the restrictions could be built into the procedure of selection. They applaud current trends in that direction. They cite the announcement by the University of Illinois that by September 1960 its freshmen will no longer be nursed along in remedial English courses. They point with approval to more than a dozen colleges which have revived foreign-language requirements for admission.

The problem is not so much whom to keep out of college, but rather how to make sure that those who should go to college do so.

The two roadblocks, the experts agree, are motivation and finances. To remove the first, they say that young people with talent will have to be shown more effectively that there is real value and excitement in higher education. To remove the second, they suggest more scholarships.

The President's committee called for 10 times the present total amount of scholarship money, estimated at about $60 million. It wants about 200,000 of the ablest and neediest high school graduates annually to be assured of a college education by having the financial burden removed from them.

In addition, it calls for between 25,000 and 50,000 subsidized campus jobs so that another large group will be able to support itself with work-study programs. In order to build higher education firmly into the American way of life, the President's committee also suggests that the tax laws be revised so that students and their parents would be assured of credits or deductions.

THE PROPOSED SOLUTION

All the experts agree that there should be a greater number of 2-year colleges for those who are unwilling or unable to commit themselves to 4 years of higher education.

Finally, the Conant report will urgently demand another reform plan which would eliminate those students who feel that they are inadequately prepared to make a living when they leave high school, and who go to college for vocational training rather than for education. The Conant plan would expect the high schools to offer vocational training of highest caliber to these students.

Considering the importance of the problem of who should go to college, it is disappointing to find the experts vague and hedging in their replies. The reason is simple: they are torn between rational planning and the commitment to an ideal. The first calls for toughness in setting up restrictions so that the colleges and universities can be made into institutions of excellence; the second dreams about the removal of all limitations from a child's educational horizon. At present, the American genius for compromise is in search of a formula that will be democratic without destroying the standards of scholarship and education.

THE PROBLEM

5. How do you pay for all this?

If mass and class in education are to be combined, perhaps for the first time in history, then the cost will be high. What compounds the difficulty is the almost pathological fear of Government control through Government financing. Yet, from the problem of the loss of potentially able teachers to higher paying jobs to the fact that local spending is not even beginning to catch up with school construction needs, every sign points to an inescapable truth: the present sources of money are insufficient to pay for a first-class mass education system.

Many schools are overcrowded, understaffed and ill-equipped. There is an estimated shortage of 142,000 classrooms and an excess of almost 2 million pupils. And within 10 years the high schools will have arrived at a point where they will face 50 to 70 percent more pupils than they can now accommodate.

THE PROPOSED SOLUTIONS

None of the experts has tackled the money problem with complete candor. The fear of an allout fight over the principle of Federal aid has led to a flood of cautious statements and even more cautious legislation. Yet between the lines the implication is clear: Federal aid will have to be a permanent part of the picture.

What are the real needs? Our total expenditure for education, from elementary school through the universities, today is approximately $14 billion annually. This is 3.6 percent of the gross national product. The experts estimate that, in order to attain the goals of quality in a system of quantity, the Nation will have to spend $30 billion annually 10 years from now, with those $30 billion measured in terms of today's purchasing power. This would mean, according to the best economists' predictions, about 5 percent of the gross national product.

The Rockefeller report points out that local and State tax systems are in some respects archiac. School expenditures are charged almost entirely to the revenue raised through property tax—and this is also the tax which meets with the most solidly organized and most vocal opposition. It is no coincidence that the rejection of school bond issues in New York State reached an all-time high last year—despite sputnik.

"It is this weakness in the State and local taxing systems more than anything else that gives rise to current proposals for increased Federal support of education," says the Rockefeller report. "For those who wish to resist or postpone the resort to Federal funds and at the same time not constrict educational services, there seems to be only one alternative: a thorough, painful, politically courageous overhaul of State and local tax systems."

Almost certainly this is not going to happen, and definitely not in time to bolster a weakened edifice of education.

The only public acknowledgment of these unpleasant facts was made by the White House Conference on Education, late in 1955, which voted better than 2 to 1 in favor of Federal aid to education, to be devoted specifically to school construction.

Congress omitted all Federal aid to school construction, however, after the administration's Federal aid proposals in 1958 completely dropped the demand for money for buildings.

Congress and the public had their eyes on scholarships, which they considered the chief ingredient of a crash program to compete with the Soviet Union. When it came to a vote and a series of compromises, the less than $1 billion aid bill offered mainly student loans (not scholarships); some graduate fellowships, plus special financial lures in the form of partly written-off loans to draw students into the teaching profession; and special funds for the improvement of guidance, language, and science teaching, vocational education, and research. The largest single amount—$300 million—was earmarked to buy science equipment for school systems in the various States. The most critically needed items, funds for buildings and for teachers' salaries, were overlooked.

Thus, the real Federal aid problem as a key to the financing of the schools remains an issue, with the fear of Federal control still the major roadblock to more sweeping appropriations. The Rockefeller report points out some safeguards that could be built into Federal aid to prevent it from leading to Federal control:

1. Federal funds would be one source of support among many.

2. State, local, and private sources of funds should continue to be the major factor in the support of education.

3. Federal funds should be used only to balance the serious gaps in the total educational system, and should be given in such a manner as to encourage State and local governments to use their own resources.

Whatever the sources may be, the experts have no doubt whatsoever that, financially, we have already faced a real emergency. "It will not be enough to meet the problem grudgingly or with a little more money," says the Rockefeller report. "The Nation's need for good education is immediate; and good education is expensive. That is the fact which the American people have never been quite prepared to face. At stake is nothing less than our national greatness and our aspirations for the dignity of the individual. If the public is not prepared for this, then responsible educators, business leaders, political leaders, unions, and civic organizations must join in a national campaign to prepare them."
